Mr. WILSON. Nothing can answer this evidence you put in yourself. There was a railroad that afterwards crossed the country, and crossed this route at Worthing.

Mr. MERRICK. Does the Worthing revenue speak prior to 1880?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; they commence on the first quarter of 1880.

Mr. MERRICK. Very well, then you have answered yourself.

Mr. WILSON. No, I have not answered myself.

Mr. MERRICK. I am talking of the testimony at the time of this expedition. You have answered yourself, sir.

Mr. WILSON. No; I have not answered myself.

Mr. MERRICK. And I am amazed that you fail to sit down abashed. I might almost use one of Mr. Ingersoll's figures of speech in reference to the liquefaction of metals.

Now, it has been said by the learned counsel—I think Mr. Chandler—that these men, to whom I refer, did not carry this mail after expedition.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before, was the statement that I made.

Mr. MERRICK. What was your statement?

Mr. CHANDLER. That they did not carry it before expedition, is my recollection of the evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. I think the learned gentleman is in error. My Brother Bliss will look it up.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Sears was the postmaster; did not carry it, but states that Mr. Ames, who appears as Mr. Miner's son-in-law, I believe, did carry it, and that he used two horses and one driver before expedition, making three.

Mr. MERRICK. Just as I said.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Withers says he commenced carrying it on the 1st of July, 1879, after expedition, I think. Is not that after expedition?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

Mr. BLISS. And that he used one man and two horses.

Mr. MERRICK. Precisely what I have said.

Mr. CHANDLER. Did you say that the men who carried it were here as witnesses?

Mr. MERRICK. I said that some of those men had actually carried it; that was my impression. I am looking to see whether I am right.

Mr. WILSON. I know you want to be right, Mr. Merrick.

Mr. MERRICK. I do want to be right, but I do not care about being disturbed by you any more after what you have said.

Mr. BLISS. As I have said, Mr. Withers commenced carrying the mail on the 1st of July, 1879 (page 825); he carried it in seven hours, and testifies that it took two horses and one man. Mr. Sears was the postmaster, and did not carry it. He says that Mr. Ames carried it, and that Mr. Ames used one man and two horses.

The COURT. That is, the same before and after expedition. You proved by the postmaster what was done before, and by the carriers what was done after.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Farish carried it afterwards, and he says he used two horses and one man (page 835). Mr. Withers carried it in 1880, and he says he used two horses and one man. And Mr. Higgason carried it also, and he says he used two horses and one man.

Mr. MERRICK. That is, after expedition?

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. I was mistaken. I thought some of them had carried it before expedition. It appears that the witnesses who carried the mail were witnesses who carried it after expedition, and there were four or five of them.

Now, let Mr. Miner answer. He swears that after expedition it took two men and four horses, making six; and the witnesses Farish, Higgason, McDaniel, and Withers all swear that after expedition it took only three; that they only used three. The falsehood is proved on Mr. Miner in respect to the number of men used after expedition. What proof? Sears, the postmaster, the man who, next to the carriers, would know the fact better than any other man upon the route, swears that to carry the mail it required one man and two horses. His evidence on that side of the affidavit therefore (before expedition) contradicts Mr. Miner flatly. So that Miner at that end of the affidavit was convicted of a falsehood by saying it required only two, whereas it required three, according to the testimony of Sears. He was guilty of falsehood at the other end of the affidavit by saying that on the expedited schedule it would require six, whereas Farish, Higgason, McDaniel, and Withers swear that it would require only three and did require only three, and that they did the work with three. Now, if we were trying Mr. Miner for perjury what would be your verdict? Ames, I believe, was Miner's son-in-law.

If you were sworn to try Miner on an indictment for perjury, because he had committed perjury in saying that after expedition it was necessary to use as many as six animals in carrying that mail on that route, and Higgason and Farish, McDaniel and Withers should come before you and swear that it was not necessary to use six, but that three were all that were required, and that they used three, did the work with three, and never subjected themselves to fines or penalties, what would you do upon such an indictment against Miner, especially if it should appear further in proof that the motive for the perjury was the gain he obtained on the contract he made with the department upon the basis of the perjury for which he was being tried? He lied for money. He was indicted. The lie is proved. The motive is accounted for. And the evidence is that the statement in the affidavit which was the basis of his theft was a deliberate falsehood, proved by those four or five witnesses. What would be your verdict? Gentlemen, as I approach these affidavits from this other point of view, you will perceive their enormity still more distinctly than you have from the different points from which they have heretofore been approached.

This has relation not only to the acrobatic Miner, but has relation to Brady. For, under the law, Brady had no right to give any additional compensation for expedition unless thereby the use of additional stock and carriers was made necessary; and in the proof in this case there was, on this expedition, no necessity for any additional stock and carriers. Brady's only escape from the charge of fraud and participation in fraud, for a violation of the law, is to say that Miner deceived him. And without meaning to speculate upon the motives of counsel or to criticise them it has always been my belief, whether right or wrong, that the reason why all the defendants were not represented here in argument before the jury was that the arguments would cross each other at various points, each seeking protection in willingness to sacrifice his friend and co-conspirator.

To show you the care of Brady, this expedited schedule missed all connection.

The COURT. What route is it?

Mr. MERRICK. It was called originally Saint Charles to Greenhorn, but it finally became Pueblo to Greenhorn.

Let us take another case illustrative of the perjury in these affidavits. Route 34149, Kearney to Kent. Length of route, one hundred and twenty-five miles; one trip, sixty hours, \$868. September 24, 1878, Fitzalon added, \$112.24. July 10, 1879, increase two trips, \$1,122.41. Total pay for three trips, \$2,102.65. Same date, expedited Kearney to Loup City, thirteen hours. You recollect that Loup City lay about half way between Kearney and Kent. Total pay for three trips and expedition, \$4,302. Oath of John M. Peck, contractor (3 A, page 571), was sworn to February 1, 1879, and it slept from that day until April 3, 1879. Kearney to Loup City, slow schedule, three trips, two men and four animals—six. Thirteen-hour schedule, three trips, six men and fourteen animals—twenty. On the present schedule six, on the proposed schedule twenty. What per cent. increase is that? About 233 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. Actually used on the thirteen-hour schedule, three trips, one man, one boy and six horses—eight. The oath says six. The proof is one man, and one boy, and six horses—eight. French, subcontractor, did all the work; he says eight only were necessary, and all that he used. The affidavit states that twenty men and animals were necessary for the expedited schedule; the evidence shows that eight were actually used. There was no expedition gained in fact. Why? French testifies that he always carried the mail from Kearney to Loup City in about twelve hours before the order of expedition—only an hour less than the time to which it was expedited—and never suffered any fines or penalties; was always on time. But before the expedition, during the long schedule, he always carried it in less time than the expedited schedule, for which expedition these parties received \$2,200 per annum. The order for expedition was, therefore, fraudulent, and took from the Treasury \$2,200 per annum. And if I am not mistaken in my recollection of the testimony—and I speak now from recollection of a general kind—Mr. French did not know of any order for expedition until he came on here, I think.

Mr. BLISS. Until the inspector went there.

Mr. MERRICK. Until the inspector went there long after the expedition; and although he was the subcontractor, and a certain percentage of the expedition was to be paid him, that percentage never was paid him, and I think he testified that he had a suit now pending to recover the percentage now due him. They not only did not let him know that there had been an order for expedition, but they did not pretend to pay him for the expedition, although his contract stipulated that when expedition was put on he should have a certain percentage additional on account of the expedition. They knew that he was carrying the mail in less time than the expedited time, and they did not inform him of the expedition, because that would inform him of his rights; and they never paid him the money, and he now has a case pending in the courts, I think he testified, for that money. You will recollect that this is the route on which, in the petition, the words "schedule thirteen hours" were inserted after it came here to Washington, according to the proof; and, according to the proof, those words were written in by Miner. So says Boone (page 2684). So says Rerdell (page 2320). And Nightingale, who prepared the petition, testifies to the fact that those words were not in the petition when he sent it here to Washington City, to post-office box 714, which was Miner's box.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, you see that on this route there was plain and distinct perjury on the part of the man who made the affidavit, by swearing that on the expedited schedule from Kearney to Loup City it would need six men and fourteen animals, whilst at that very time the mail was being carried from Kearney to Loup City in less time than the expedited schedule called for, with one man, a boy, and six horses, making eight. [Mr. Chandler rose.] Do you want to correct me?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. French was not notified of the expedition. On page 612 you will find that you introduced a letter yourself, notifying Mr. French on July 10, 1879—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I was speaking from recollection.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. French stated that he never heard of expedition until he was told that he must make the time in thirteen hours, but he never knew it as expedition. Miner informs him by this letter that from August 1, 1879, his pay will be $1,587.40, for three trips per week, thirteen hours schedule, between Kearney and Loup City, once a week. He knew that, but the $1,587.40 is not the percentage on the expedited pay which his contract called for.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is not the point.

Mr. BLISS. It is the evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. He was not notified of expedition.

Mr. CHANDLER. He says so.

Mr. MERRICK. He was notified to make the trip within a certain time, and he had been making it before that within a shorter time. His pay was modified, but it was not modified according to his contract. There was a covenant in his contract which stipulated that he should be paid a certain percentage for the expedition.

Mr. CHANDLER. The point I make is that he was notified at the time of the expedition.

The COURT. He was not notified, though, of the order for expedition,

Mr. MERRICK. No, and the notification to him was not that he would be entitled to any additional pay under the covenant of his contract which stipulated for additional pay on the expedition.

Mr. BLISS. May I read from page 652?

Q. Was any information every communicated to you that there had been an expedited schedule ordered for which the Government was to pay an additional sum?—A. No, sir.

Q. When did you first learn of that fact?—A. I think it was in September last.

Q. You do not mean September, 1882?—A. No; September, 1881.

Q. How did you learn of it then?—A. By the Post-Office inspector coming and showing me the orders.

Q. Did you ever receive from these defendants any pay for increased speed?

Then came an objection and argument, and then on page 655:

Q. Did you ever receive any pay for expedited service?—A. Not that I know of.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not deny that he testified to that, but I do say that he was notified, and they themselves introduced the evidence of it.

Mr. MERRICK. Not notified, again I say, of expedition; not notified of the order for expedition, and that letter is no such notification. And why? It does not tell him that an order has been passed. It tells him that he must make the time. It does not propose to pay him the sum stipulated in his contract as the percentage on expedition, and therefore it proposes to pay him some sum which is greatly less than he would have been entitled to upon expedition. He had a right to suppose—erroneous though the supposition was—that he was dealing with honest men; and he had a right to suppose that, when they wrote him a letter in which they mentioned that he must carry the mail in thirteen hours and did not specifically say that it was on expedition to be paid for by the department, and did not offer to pay him according to the covenant of his contract, there was no such order. And in point of fact he swears that he did not so understand it. They never paid him according to that contract. They knew he was in the dark. If they did write him that letter they knew he did not understand it, because they never paid him, and they knew in the course of their intercourse with him afterwards that French did not know what he was entitled to, because he did not demand it, and they kept it because they thought they could steal it away from him. When he found out that he was entitled to it, when he came on here to Washington and learned that there was an order on the files of the department giving them this money, he bade them stand and account.

Being Friday afternoon, may it please your honor, and some of the jury—especially Mr. Greene—desiring at least two days to prepare for the worship of Sunday, I think we might as well let them off for the rest of this afternoon.

Mr. GREENE. I think I want to prepare my ears; Mr. Merrick's lungs are very strong.

Mr. MERRICK. I hope I did not drive it clear through, but just drove it in.

Mr. GREENE. I don't know.

The COURT. Adjourn the court until Monday morning.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the further hearing of this case was adjourned until Monday, June 4, 1883, at 11 o'clock a. m.

MONDAY, JUNE 4, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court and gentlemen of the jury: Following along regularly in the course of thought which I have been presenting for your consideration as to the official conduct of Brady and his malversation in reference to these routes

I propose calling your attention to one of his favorite theories of the manner of discharging the executive functions of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and show you how far he conformed his conduct to that theory. One of his favorite theories, as he tells us, was to give a daily service on every star route in the country. In order to characterize the policy in office of his predecessor, he called the policy of the Postmaster-General who preceded the Postmaster-General under whom he was then serving the Jewellian policy, which he said was to give a greater and more rapid service to the railroad routes and to the interior cities of the older settled portions of the country, which, from the multitude of their population as well as large commercial interests, might be properly called metropolitan cities. He, on the contrary, held to a policy of giving a daily mail to the different localities throughout the West, so that the pioneer in the far-off regions might have his mail at least once a day. In the course of what I have said to you I have endeavored to explain, although very briefly, yet sufficiently for your full understanding, how much more desirable it would necessarily be to men engaged in agricultural pursuits, in grazing, and in those primitive and original but all-important occupations of life which lie at the foundation of all our prosperity and wealth, to have a daily instead of a fast mail. At page 3403 Mr. Brady says:

Q. And you proceeded as far as possible to carry out that policy, did you?—A. I did.

Q. Introducing daily service upon every route?—A. Not upon every route, but as rapidly as we could.

Q. You did as far as possible?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was what you were aiming at, was it?—A. That was the ultimate object.

Again, at page 3392, prior to what I last read:

Q. What interest had you in making any of the orders set forth in the indictment, or other orders relating to the routes in question?—A. Only the interest that I had in building up the service, doing what I thought was a good thing. I was particularly interested in the star service.

None of us doubt that.

The policy of the department before I came in was known as the Jewellian policy; that is, the spending of all the money appropriated for mail transportation for railroad towns and cities. I believed that country towns and people, depending upon the starservice, were entitled to some consideration at the hands of the Government that monopolized the right to carry the mail and would not allow anybody else to carry it, under pains and penalties. I believe so yet.

Q. Did you have any personal interest in the matter?—A. No personal interest except that interest. And probably if I had staid in the department long enough I would have had a daily mail everywhere.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, we have from himself the declaration of his theory that there ought to have been a daily mail everywhere. Let us pause for a single moment here before considering whether there was a daily mail established everywhere; and, if not, why not; and reflect upon the pecuniary results of a daily mail which would arise from multiplication of trips compared with the pecuniary results which I have shown you arose from expedition when founded upon false affidavits. I have shown you, gentlemen, that when false affidavits are filed distorting the proportions, which the law declares shall perpetually exist and never be changed, between the outlay of the contractor and his income on the original contract and the outlay of the contractor and his income or pay on the changed and expedited contract, the violation of that law and the wringing of these proportions out of their proper relations to each other can create an indefinite amount of expenditure on the part of the Government for the expedition and an indefinite amount of profit on the part of the contractor. You have also seen, as I have gone along, how, in reference to the multiplication of trips, there could only be a certain designated sum realized for each trip. For instance, if on the original contract one trip would cost $500 and you added another trip, all you had to do was to multiply the original cost and thus pay for the second trip just what you paid for the first. Thus, for two trips it would be $1,000; for three trips, $1,500; for four trips, $2,000; for five trips, $2,500, and for six trips, $3,000. That was all that could by any possibility be done. But under the magical operation of a false affidavit and expedition a route originally costing $500 could be run up, as it was in many cases, to thirty and forty thousand dollars. Brady himself told you he could not possibly see how the Tongue River route could be carried for the compensation which the Government had agreed to pay on the original contract, and did not see how adequate compensation could be given to the contractor by any change he might make in that contract by the addition of trips, and that, therefore, to help the contractor—I am giving the substance of his testimony—and enable him to carry the mail on that route, it was necessary for him to introduce into the manipulations by which the contractor's pay could be increased his theory of expedition. Now, gentlemen, I will give you the last table of figures with which I shall trouble you.

The COURT. Are you on the Tongue River route?

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; not on the Tongue River route! I have here a table of figures showing how he could have made six trips a week if he had chosen, or given a daily mail at greatly less cost than he paid for giving expedition on three trips a week. I propose to show you, gentlemen of the jury, that on all these routes manipulated by Brady at the time he increased and expedited them up to three trips he could have created six trips a week and saved the Government of the United States $77,706. I will take them up seriatim. On the Kearney and Kent route the contractor was Peck. I will take three trips a week and expedition. I do not want to repeat and go back and show what the trips were originally. I have ground enough to travel over without repeating. At three trips and expedition that route cost $4,309.65. The expedition, by the way, gentlemen of the jury, as you will recollect, they never got, for you will bear in mind that it was on the route from Kearney to Kent that French was the subcontractor, and French testified that he had carried the mail just as fast before the expedition was ordered as he did after expedition was ordered, and that he never was paid according to the contract his percentage upon the expedited time, and knew nothing about the expedition having been ordered until he learned it from a post-office inspector who was examining the route. Four thousand three hundred and two dollars and sixty-five cents for three trips and expedition. Six trips would have cost what? Six trips would have cost only $3,786.26. By giving them six trips a week instead of having passed that order of expedition which was never executed, but remained here a dead letter on the books of the Post-Office Department, except so far as it furnished these conspirators with pay, he could have saved to the Government $516.39 on the price. Reflect, gentlemen, that here is an executive officer of the United States who, before this jury, and in this court, solemnly testified that a daily mail was the material want of the country. That was his theory of the want of the people; that was his theory of the proper manner in which to exercise the power vested in the Second Assistant Postmaster-General by the laws of the United States, and then having that in your mind reflect for a single instant upon what each one of you yourselves must know, would not a daily mail be preferable to a mail three times a week on an expedited schedule?

The COURT. Mr. Brady, when he was on the stand expressing his views and giving his testimony, declared that a blind man could see that three trips a week with expedition was better than six trips a week without expedition.

Mr. MERRICK. He may have said that in part of his testimony. He also said in the part that I have read what I have stated to the court. Now he says that a blind man can see that six trips a week without expedition would not be as good as three trips.

The COURT. Would not be as good a service as three trips a week with expedition.

Mr. MERRICK. I will take the single route from Kearney to Kent. What was the distance?

The COURT. Forty-nine miles.

Mr. WOODWARD. It was expedited only part of the way.

Mr. KER. One hundred and twenty-five miles is the whole distance.

Mr. MERRICK. Forty-nine miles from Kearney to Loup City was the expedited distance. Let us say fifty miles. We will take an arbitrary case of fifty miles. Now, I ask you, gentlemen, whether in what Brady said when he stated that a blind man could see that three trips a week with expedition was a better service than six trips a week without it, was he sincere, was he honest, was he not wriggling in a corner where cross-examination had forced him? Think of it for a minute. Take a route fifty miles long. Suppose you go at the rate of two miles an hour, or three miles an hour, which is slow time, and you get your mail in thirteen or fifteen hours, and you get it every day. Expedite it to ten hours, and make the schedule ten hours for three trips a week. If you have a trip every day would you not get your mail by the every-day trip sooner than you would by a schedule of three times a week and expedition? If the schedule is three times a week and expedition, and you put in a letter to-day after the mail has gone and the next mail does not go until Wednesday, the letter that you put in to go by Wednesday's mail will not reach its destination at the other end of the route as soon as the letter you put in this evening would reach its destination by to-morrow's mail if it was a daily mail. Is it not palpable and plain? Independent of minute calculations upon that subject, is it not palpable and plain to you and every one of you that in your social and domestic relations, that in your business operations, if you were engaged in business operations such as occupy those men west of the western boundary of the Missouri, in our far-off territory under the shadow of the Rocky Mountains, to the east and to the west of those mountains, you would prefer a daily mail to an expedited three-times-a-week mail? What is there in the occupation and the business of such a people, an agricultural people, that requires great rapidity of intercourse between them and any other people, or between different members of the same community? Frequency of intercourse is infinitely preferable to rapidity of intercourse, and, in answer to Mr. Brady's statement on the stand, I will say that a blind man, if he could see at all, could plainly see that a multiplication of trips is preferable to expedition of trips.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). It would depend on the length of the route, I should say.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Certainly.

The FOREMAN. Evidently on this route a daily mail would be preferable to expedition and three trips.

Mr. MERRICK. It would not depend on the length of the route. A route may be subdivided, and generally is, by intervening post-offices between the two termini of the routes. The rule is the same, no matter how long the route is. If the route is five hundred miles long it amounts to pretty much the same thing. But you must consider not only the convenience and the interest of the people at the two termini of the route, but you must consider the interests and the welfare of the people living between the termini and getting their mail from offices that lie between the two offices at the ends of the route.

The FOREMAN. Take the Bismarck and Tongue River route, for instance. That was one hundred and eight hours. Would not expedition and three trips a week be better than a daily mail at one hundred and eight hours?

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir. There were supposed to be intermediate post-offices on that route.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

The COURT. There was not a post-office.

Mr. MERRICK. There were supposed to be. There was proposed to be a side post-office.

The COURT. That fell through.

Mr. MERRICK. I will come to that. There was proposed to be a side post-office on that route. It was supposed that there might have been intermediate offices. In fact there were none. But even a daily mail would be greatly preferable to an expedited mail of three times a week. Independent of the convenience of the people why would it not be preferable in view of the benefits to the United States?

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask you if the advertisement——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] On the Kearney and Kent route, as I have explained to you, there were three trips, at a cost of $4,302.65. By making it six trips the Government would have been saved $516.39.

The COURT. Mr. Crane, the foreman, just now said that on the Tongue River route the time under the contract was one hundred and eight hours.

The FOREMAN. I understood that it was originally.

The COURT. No. The original time, according to the contract, was eighty-four hours. The contract required that the mail should leave Bismarck Monday at 6 a. m., and arrive at Tongue River Thursday by 6 p. m.

Mr. WILSON. The time was subsequently changed.

The COURT. I have an abstract of the contract before me, and the contract requires the mail to leave Bismarck Monday at 6 a. m., and arrive at Tongue River Thursday by 6 p. m. I think that makes it eighty-four hours.

Mr. WILSON. We have had that up half a dozen times. It was restated, as said half a dozen times by Mr. Bliss, at one hundred and eight hours.

Mr. MERRICK. It never was run at that. The time was eighty-four hours.

The FOREMAN. The route was advertised at two hundred and fifty miles, I think, and when they found it was three hundred and ten miles the time was changed.

Mr. WILSON. That has been stated by Mr. Bliss half a dozen times.

Mr. MERRICK. Eighty-four hours was the time.

Mr. WILSON. It was advertised at eighty-four hours and restated at one hundred and eight, as Mr. Bliss has over and over again stated to the court and jury.

The COURT. There is some confusion in regard to that.

Mr. MERRICK. What does the advertisement say?

Mr. WILSON. The advertisement says:

From Bismarck by Yellowstone to Tongue River, two hundred and fifty miles, and back, once a week. Leave Bismarck Monday at 6 a. m.; arrive at Tongue River Thursday by 6 p. m.

That makes eighty-four hours. That was the original time. Then they restated the distance at one hundred and eight hours.

Mr. MERRICK. Will you show me the order?

Mr. WILSON. Now, Mr. Merrick—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Don't you know there is no such order?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Bliss has said half a dozen times that it is so. That is not the way to deal with this case.

Mr. MERRICK. It is the way to deal with this case. The way is to deal fairly, frankly, and honestly, as I have dealt with it; and not as the gentleman has dealt with me by interruption.

Mr. WILSON. I will not say that you have dealt with it dishonestly.

Mr. MERRICK. I have dealt with it fairly.

Mr. WILSON. I will say that the gentleman has not dealt with it fairly.

Mr. MERRICK. I challenge the gentleman to produce an order changing that time. I will show him a law which prohibited them from elongating that time. The law would not allow it to be done. Counsel himself took that very ground when Judge Bennett asked that the time should be elongated upon another route. He claimed before the court himself that Judge Bennett's request was not granted not because the Second Assistant was not disposed to elongate the time or diminish the pay to the contractor, but because the Second Assistant was not allowed by law to elongate the time.

Mr. WILSON. You did not dispute it.

Mr. MERRICK. I did dispute it.

Mr. WILSON. Do you now?

Mr. MERRICK. I do. I am talking about what you claim, chameleon like, colored to suit the occasion.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. I never color anything to suit the occasion.

The COURT. This route is a very important one and figures largely in this trial. The contract certainly required in the first place the mail to be carried in eighty-four hours each way, and prescribed the days upon which it should leave each end. At that time it was supposed that the length of the route was two hundred and fifty miles. Before any service was put on the route, however, and, in fact, before the first of July arrived, both Mr. Boone and Mr. Miner had ascertained that the length of the route was more than three hundred miles.

Mr. WILSON. Three hundred and ten.

The COURT. And before any service was put on, or the time arrived for putting it on, S. W. Dorsey wrote to General Rosser, who was a civil engineer exploring that country, to furnish the Second Assistant Postmaster-General with the exact length of the route, and that was furnished by General Rosser as three hundred and three miles. That was recognized as the length of the route in one instance, but somehow or other—and I cannot see how; the record does not show by what means—they extended the route from three hundred and three to three hundred and ten miles. But the fact is that all subsequent orders recognized the length of the route as three hundred and ten miles, though I do not think you can find any order in the evidence to show that for the performance of once-a-week service the time was extended from eighty-four hours to one hundred and eight, even after the ascertainment of the true length of the route. Indeed, the service, according to my recollection of the evidence, was not put on at all until three trips a week and expedition were allowed.

Mr. WILSON. Your honor is mistaken.

The COURT. Well, in the fall of the year 1878 some time, on the affidavit of Miner, accompanied by his proposal that he would carry the mail three times a week in sixty-five hours, an order was made by Mr. Brady to that effect. His offer was to carry it two additional trips a week in sixty-five hours for an additional compensation of $32,650 a year. But the service, at three times a week in sixty-five hours, went into operation on the 1st of January, 1879, I think. There was a very short trial of the once-a-week trips, and I am very sure—I have looked for it myself—that you cannot find any such order extending the time on once a week to one hundred and eight hours. This affidavit of Miner, on which he obtained the three trips and reduction of time, never stated the number of men and horses required at once a week. It was a mere proposal that he would carry it on the new schedule for a certain amount of money, and saying that on the then present schedule, three trips a week, it would require twelve men and thirteen horses. That is the way I understand it. I do not know of any order reducing the time under the contract, or extending the time.

Mr. WILSON. Your honor is mistaken about once a week. The service was started at once a week on the 1st of July, as required by the contract. I stated in my argument that that matter was left in some confusion, and there is just exactly the confusion that your honor has spoken of.

The COURT. Is it not a fact that the only evidence that any service was put on under the affidavit on the 1st of July was a statement of some postmaster out there that the mail had started on the 1st of July?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no.

Mr. CARPENTER. The witnesses proved it.

Mr. BLISS. If I may be permitted, certain witnesses stated that they commenced service on the 1st of July, and they also say that they took seven or eight days in going through; that they went through on their trips entirely without reference to the schedule time.

Mr. WILSON. They started the mail on the 1st of July.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. John W. Dorsey undoubtedly went to Bismarck and got it started on the 1st of July, so that there was no failure at the outset.

The COURT. John W. Dorsey testifies that the latter part of July he went there to make arrangements for the service.

Mr. BLISS. Precisely; and I think the record will show that they went through, but not on time or anything like time.

The COURT. There was probably an imperfect service started the 1st of July.

Mr. BLISS. With reference to time I made a suggestion to Mr. Wilson when he was arguing of an easy way to settle it. The route-book can be brought here in a moment, and that will show whether there was ever any order issued extending the time beyond eighty-four hours.

Mr. MERRICK. There never was. I just said there never was.

Mr. BLISS. I have examined the route-book; it is not for me to say what is in it, but I have examined it with a good deal of care.

The COURT. There was no such order put in by either side.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir.

The COURT. I dare say that whilst this imperfect service at once a week was on they took practically as much time as they chose to make that one trip.

Mr. MERRICK. The route was expedited on October 4, 1878.

Mr. WILSON. That is a mistake.

Mr. MERRICK. The jacket is dated October 4; the order is later.

Mr. WILSON. The order is December 23, 1878.

Mr. MERRICK. On the route from Bismarck to Tongue River Miner was the contractor. That is the route about which we have had some trouble heretofore. The last time I undertook to speak of some matters in connection with it we got into this same trouble, and I left it out and took other routes, for I am only dealing in specimen routes. However, I will go on and read this table:

Three trips and expedition cost $35,000.

Mr. BLISS. Excuse me, Mr. Merrick, but the order for expedition on Bismarck and Tongue River recites that the present schedule is three and a half days, which is eighty-four hours.

Mr. CARPENTER. What page?

Mr. BLISS. 2139.

Mr. MERRICK. That is conclusive; that settles it. On the Tongue River route the schedule was eighty-four hours. Three trips and expedition cost $35,000. Six trips, gentlemen, would have cost, at eighty-four hours, $14,100. Six trips, therefore, would have saved the United States $20,900. Now, I ask you, gentlemen of the jury, whether there was any occasion for an expedition costing this immense sum on that route, which ran through a perfect wilderness. The first sound made in the woods, after the wild shriek of the savage, was the sound of the axeman preparing the way for this route. Civilization had not taken up her seat along-side of the road. Enterprise had not entered into the forest or the plains there or thereabouts. The white man stood on this side, and looked across the forest beyond the point where civilization had reached. In the intermediate places there was neither enterprise nor civilization, nor people. John W. Dorsey tells you that when he was out there preparing that route he had to get an escort from General Miles, for protection, at the very time he started the mail on the route. General Sherman, it is true, says "Yes, let us have the mail, mail on that route, and mail everywhere." Why? "Mails help to picket the country," and he spoke with some emphasis in favor of frequent mails through that wild region among the Indians and through wild regions contiguous thereto. What was his reason? General Sherman—gallant and able man, immortal name that will go down in our history forever!—General Sherman would take every cent appropriated to every department of the Government that he could lay his hand on legally and give it to the Army to save the Army expense and trouble. General Sherman would picket not only the Northwestern frontier with postmasters and mail routes, but would have them over the whole country, in order to save the Army appropriations and protect the soldiers. It is perfectly natural, therefore, that he should wish for this additional aid. And when he spoke of these mail routes and mails, he spoke of the stations along the route as so many stations for pickets to save the Army the necessity of picketing those localities. But for the needs of the people, gentlemen, where was there any need for an expedited route along that line? What people were there that needed rapidity of communication? If there was a mail needed at all, even for General Sherman's purposes, it was a frequent mail, and not a rapid mail. If a mail was needed there for picketing, it was a mail that went over the route every day and not once in two days.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). Here is a point that has not been cleared up, and it seems to me this is the place to settle it now. This route was advertised at two hundred and fifty miles in eighty-four hours. When the route was found to be three hundred and ten miles long would not the contractor be obliged under his contract to carry the mail in eighty-four hours?

Mr. MERRICK. The contract says so, and it uses this expression, unfortunately:

This proposal is made with full knowledge of the distance of the route.

So says John R. Miner in signing the proposal. When the route was expedited you will recollect, Mr. Foreman, that by the covenants of the contract the contractor had a right to throw it up and say he would not carry it. But without some action on the part of the Post-Office Department the contractor was by the covenants of his contract bound to carry it according to his contract; and for the reason that the Post-Office Department is obliged, after using its best exertions to ascertain accurately the length of these routes, to throw the burden upon the contractor. In putting in his bid the contractor says, in effect, "I bid upon this route on your advertisement, and my proposal is made with full knowledge of the length of the route, the weight of the mails to be carried, and all other particulars in reference to the route and service, after careful examination of the forms and instructions attached to said advertisement." So said John R. Miner in his bid, and so became he bound by the covenants of his deed.

Now, a daily mail could have been ordered on that route and $20,900 saved thereby to the Government. Why would not a daily mail have subserved the needs of such a people better than an expedited mail at three times a week? Answer me, Mr. Foreman. Why was not that $20,900 saved to the Government? That is a question that has been running all the way down through this case, and which now, although not heretofore distinctly repeated, I shall begin to ask and continue to ask. Why was this thing so? That question I shall repeat in reference to these various orders to which I shall call your attention this morning.

Why was it that nineteen routes, taken at forty-one thousand and odd dollars, should in a little over one year have been so manipulated by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and these defendants as to cost the Government four hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars a year, including the original $41,000? Or why should that original sum of $41,000, the total cost of those routes when the contracts were taken, have had added to it on these nineteen routes in a little more than one year the enormous sum of four hundred and thirty-odd thousand dollars per annum? Why was it? Your inquiry goes forth, as it must go forth in the course of what I shall show you and what I have shown? Why was it? Why was it? If no answer comes, then your minds, your hearts, and your judgments must search to find the reason, and the answer to your inquiries will come that the motive of Brady was that he was a corrupt official, using his official power for corrupt purposes in combination with his co-conspirators, the defendants in this case. For a motive you must find. All human actions have a motive. The human hand may move; it is, at the instigation of the human brain and will, impelled by a motive. A motive regulates your every step; a motive regulates your every act. And in an inquiry with reference to the criminality of human conduct there is no surer way of leading to the truth than ascertaining what was the motive of the questionable act, by looking into the laws of nature and determining according to those laws and the evidence before us what could have been the motive of the act. And when you once get at an act, if you wish to ascertain the character of that act from the circumstances and your knowledge of the course of human transactions, you must look upon the motive, and when you touch the motive, a flood of light is thrown upon the case, and makes it palpable in its real character as either pure and stainless or black and criminal.

Consider White River to Rawlins, with which you are quite familiar in connection with the affidavits. The original three trips, and expedition added, cost $13,706.25. Six trips would have cost $10,200. Had there been six trips from White River to Rawlins, instead of expedition on three trips, the Government would have saved $3,506.25. Why was it that Brady did not save that money to the Government, and give six trips over the route from Rawlins to White River? White River is, I believe, what you might call the jumping-off place. Is there anything beyond it? Nothing but a wilderness. There stops the mail. There had stopped the tide of emigration and of civilization. The wilds beyond hear no echo from our enterprising people. Why, then, should the United States be required to pay this large sum for expediting the mail to a point which lay upon the line that divided the red man from the white? What was Brady's motive? Founded upon false affidavits, as I have shown you, the order was made. What was their motive for making the false affidavits—affidavits manipulated not by one, but by two or three, whose finger imprints are over them?

What was the motive of these men in swearing falsely? What was the motive of Brady in dealing unjustly with the Government, and taking this money from the public Treasury to expedite a mail to the border lines of civilized life?

Saint Charles to Greenhorn. John R. Miner was the contractor. Three trips and expedition cost the Government $3,945.60. Six trips would have cost $2,630.40. Six trips would therefore have saved to the United States Government $1,315.20. What was the motive in giving expedition there instead of giving the six trips? It was a short route; only thirty-five miles, Mr. Crane. What was his motive? What was the main-spring of his action? Why should he do it? Not only that, gentlemen of the jury, but it missed connection after expedition. He had expedited the route at this large cost instead of giving the six trips at less cost, and after he had expedited it, it reached its destination just after the mail had left going west, and a short time after the mail had left going east; so that the mail coming from Greenhorn had to lie over some thirteen hours before it could start west, and some twenty hours before it could start east. There it had to sleep whilst Brady was paying this extravagant rate to travel fast upon the road. Why should it not have traveled slowly without this pay, and thus have prevented or avoided these delays at the end of the route? It was, therefore, a purely local intercommunication, for letters from Greenhorn could neither go east nor west for from twelve to twenty-three hours after their arrival at the end of the route. And when they could neither go east nor west without lying that long at the Greenhorn end, I ask again why, in the name of all that is honorable and honest, should Brady have given that kind of expedition? Had there been a daily mail, the letters could only have lain over twelve hours, anyhow, either going west or east, even if they had missed connection, for within that time the mail would certainly run between the two places, making connection with the grand through routes west and east. Again, where was Brady's motive?

Trinidad to Madison, forty-five miles long, according to the advertisement; sixty after they put on Raton. Expedition and three trips a week cost $4,290.30. Six trips, Mr. Foreman, would have cost $3,064.50. Six trips would then have saved the United States $1,225.80. Why, again, was this? It was a short route. Why was it?

Garland to Parrott City—a route about which I shall have something further to say by and by. John W. Dorsey was the contractor. Three trips and expedition, $13,433.04. Six trips would have cost $9,950.40. Had you given them six trips instead of expedition and trips you would have saved to the Government $3,482.64. They would have had a daily mail, and $3,482.64 would have been saved to the Government.

Now I come to something that is interesting, may it please your honor. Mineral Park to Pioche. Three trips and expedition cost $22,300. Six trips would have cost $17,892. I want you to bear this in mind particularly, gentlemen. Six trips would, therefore, have saved $4,408 to the Government. On Mineral Park and Pioche, then, upon which he had given three trips and expedition at a cost of $22,300, had he, instead of expediting, made it six trips, he would have saved the Government $4,408. I will show you why that would not do. Now let us see.

I said that was an interesting route. Your honor will recollect that on that route the time was expedited from two and seventy-six one-hundredths miles per hour—which was the original time, and slower than Dorsey says in his letter to Joseph an ordinary horse can walk—to three and eighty one-hundredths miles an hour, as slow, according to Dorsey, as any horse ought to walk. That expedition was a little over a mile an hour, and for that little over a mile of expedition on the three trips Brady paid $4,408 more than he would have had to pay for six trips upon the original time of two and seventy-six one-hundredths miles an hour. Mr. Foreman, would you have done that? Would you not have stood amazed and shocked at a request to do that? Would you not have been frightened at the language of fraud and accusation that would have arisen out of the figures as you looked at them?

But worse remains on that route, as well as on some others. Having expedited on these false affidavits that I have shown you, having broken the proportion which the law requires to be observed between the receipts and expenditures on the original contract and the receipts and expenditures on the expedited contract, having made a fraud enter into the three trips and expedited time, what did he then do? He then adds additional trips, doubles up the gross sum, and makes the additional pay on that route $29,733. And here I may pause, gentlemen, to show you for a single moment how this fraud fructified. A route where there is a certain contract price cannot be made very lucrative by adding trips. But the more trips you have, if you are making anything at all, the more you make. You double the cost of each trip. On expedition within the law you can make nothing. On expedition beyond the law, on false affidavits, destroying the proportions I have indicated, you can make an indefinite amount. Now, what did Brady and these conspirators do? They took the route in its infancy at the original price; then they expedited; then they multiplied trips and said "three trips a week and so much expedition are worth so much"—what I have indicated to you here on Mineral Park and Pioche—$22,300, bringing it up some $15,000 to $20,000; then they added three trips more and doubled that sum—doubling the price of the trips and doubling the amount developed by the fraud and the false affidavits. Gentlemen, if there was any better device or scheme that genius could conceive and rascality put in practice for the purpose of robbing the Treasury by means to these routes I have been unable to find it. Indeed I have been utterly amazed at the fecundity of the intellect of these gentlemen who are now standing at the bar of justice in the multiplication and variety of instrumentalities by which they burglariously entered the Treasury of the people.

Now, we will take Tres Alamos to Clifton. Dorsey was the contractor. Three trips and expedition cost $14,112. Six trips alone would have cost $9,408. Six trips then would have saved to the Government $4,704. Why was it not done? Did that people living in that far-off region need this expedition? No. What else was done? After he had performed this operation upon the false affidavit on that route, and got it up to three trips with expedition; he then multiplied it and allowed for subsequent trips $15,950.

Eugene City to Bridge Creek. Three trips and expedition, $21,460.89. Six trips would have cost $13,949.58. Had he given them six trips on that route—and you recollect the affidavits on that route—he would have saved to the Government $7,511. He did not do it. Why? What was his motive? Had he saved that to the Government, and not added expedition for the purpose of enhancing the price to be allowed for carrying the mail on that route, the contractors would not have received so much money, and he would not have received his 30 per cent. You must give him a motive. Give him a reasonable motive, for Mr. Brady is not a simpleton, as we have had occasion to see. He knew what he was doing, and he knew as well the results of his acts beyond the law as he did the limitations of the law that taught him they were malversations in office.

The Dalles to Baker City, three trips and expedition, $31,080. Six trips a week would have cost $24,864, and thus have saved to the Government $6,216. Why was not that done? Why was not that amount saved? Why need I ask that question in reference to The Dalles and Baker City route, may it please your honor? Expedition asked for by the people apparently upon petitions gotten up by them, but stimulated by the contractors; expedition ordered; expedition paid for; expedition never put on for one long year after it was ordered. At the end of every quarter the contractors walked up to the Treasury and drew their money for services they knew they were not performing. The order was made, and a whole year elapsed without the order being executed; a whole year passed by without the expedition being put upon the route; and that people, who were represented as being so clamorous for a faster mail, seeing this thing right in their midst, remained passive and quiet, never uttered a breath of complaint, never made a murmur of distress; and the Government itself never discovered the fraud until these investigations began. Brady no doubt knew the fraud, but I say the honest officials of the Government never discovered the fraud until Brady had made way for that integrity which now, representing the Post-Office Department and illustrating the high principles of morality of the present administration, is running that department to the satisfaction of the people and making it pay its own expenses day by day. No more robberies there; no more need for deficiency bills there. No, sir. The people are satisfied. The mail goes everywhere—to the metropolitan city, and to the cabin of the pioneer. From one end of the nation to the other it goes, carrying news, intelligence, business information, and letters of affectionate esteem and love, carrying them with regularity, to the entire satisfaction of the people, and no expedition, no duplication of trips, running on the schedule, and paying the expenses of the Post-Office Department without burdening the people by taxation.

Canyon City to Camp McDermitt, another one of those interesting routes that suggests some painful reflections in reference to these defendants. Mr. Peck was the contractor. Three trips and expedition cost the Government $21,500. Six trips would have cost $17,328. Six trips a week, therefore, would have saved to the Government $4,172. Why was it not done? What did he add after this?

Mr. BLISS. Four trips, $41,000.

Mr. MERRICK. $28,666, making $50,166.66 in whole for that route. These figures may confuse a little, but I want to be accurate. The cost of this route went up to $50,166.66. What was the expedition for which this large pay was given? It was expedited, may it please your honor, from one and ninety-one one-hundredths miles an hour—I want to call your honor's attention to it as well as that of the jury—to two and fifty-three one-hundredths miles an hour; it was made to run about half a mile faster. For running that half mile faster this enormous sum of money was paid when, instead of the $50,000 ultimately paid for trips and this half mile faster, he could have secured the six trips for $17,328. Where is the motive? Where is the purpose? Heart and mind of man, answer me. Where was the motive? Where was the purpose? How could it be done? How could this officer have done such a thing?

Julian to Colton. Three trips and expedition, $8,910. Six trips would have cost $7,128. Six trips would have saved $1,782. And yet it was not done. But the expedited schedule missed its connections all around. The mail lay over at the end of the route before it could be sent east or west.

Redding to Alturas. Three trips and expedition, $35,930.66. Six trips would have cost $17,964. Six trips would have saved to the Government, therefore, $17,966.66. What about this expedition? No expedition was ever made, says Major (page 1275). Major was the sub-contractor, I believe. He made the time, before the expedition was ordered, shorter than the order required. And yet, at the very date of the order, at the very time this Second Assistant Postmaster-General wrote the order upon that route, the mail was being carried in less time than the time in which he ordered it to be carried.

Gentlemen, these things must startle you, as they startled me when I first looked into them, and as they must have startled the whole country from one end to the other.

Mr. Ingersoll said in his speech that "You can never convict S. W. Dorsey; you may poison the public press, and, by that poisoning, poison public opinion." But we have not poisoned the press. We have sought to poison no public opinion. But when these facts came out, as developed by an examination of the records of the departments of the Government, the whole people stood aghast at the fraud of which they had heard and of which they were the victims, and from one end of the country to the other a wild shout went up, "Let justice be done though the heavens fall!" That is the explanation of the poisoning. It is the public sentiment, the honest declaration of judgment upon these confederates and co-conspirators through the public press. This is no sudden outburst. This is no sudden exclamation of passion that goes up from the people. It is long-settled conviction, founded upon the publication of these very facts that I have detailed to you, and to-day this whole people sit at the end of the electric wire listening to catch every sound from this city to see whether it is impossible in the capital of the nation to get a jury to condemn a man that has been great, who has done wrong, but who is still rich. Yes, they are listening and looking and asking whether everything in Washington is permeated with the corruption of which they have heard; is this, indeed, the center of iniquity, and has the virus crept into the judicial tribunals as well as into the executive departments of the Government? Are the judicial tribunals poisoned here in the very shadow of the Capitol? Their purity is our last hope. They are the last stronghold of the Republic, and when that falls then honesty is gone and iniquity may hold high carnival everywhere without fear of retributive justice, conscious that it is beyond the reach of the law.

I now beg leave to call your attention to another point in connection with these routes where Brady, in order to gain the emoluments of the conspiracy of which he was a member, disregarded and violated the law. I have shown you, gentlemen, how carefully Congress had guarded against fraud and the abuse of official power in regard to contracts for carrying the mails, by requiring that in every case where the extraordinary and exceptional power to expedite a route should be called into exercise it should be only to meet some special or unforeseen contingency, and that the additional compensation should be in the same proportion to the original compensation as the number of horses and carriers necessarily employed on the original schedule bore to the number of horses and carriers necessarily required on the expedited schedule, so that through all changes and conditions there should be preserved the exact proportion between outlay by contractor and payment by the Government, as that proportion was established in the contract made in the original letting. I have also shown you how these defendants broke through that law by means of false affidavits. I have also shown to you how this ingenious scheme of fraud was devised in 1878, and how, at that time, the custom of the department was revolutionized by Brady, in making the exercise of the extraordinary and exceptional power conferred upon the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to meet extraordinary and exceptional emergencies the daily habit of his office to meet the avaricious demands of himself and his co-conspirators. I will now conduct you a little further along that you may see to what all this led, and how, having concluded to break through one law, Brady's audacity increased with his success, and he determined to trample under foot another law, which is the greatest safeguard of the Treasury against the depredations upon it by any high functionaries of the Government. I will read to you section 3679 of the Revised Statutes of the United States:

No department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year—

That is, from June 30th to July 1st of the next year—

any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

You will perceive, gentlemen of the jury, that this provision guards the Treasury door against invasion from the high civil functionaries of the Government. No department shall, under any circumstances, expend in any one fiscal year more than the amount appropriated for it by Congress, nor shall it involve the Government by contract in obligations for a greater amount than is appropriated for that fiscal year. You comprehend it without further explanation. That law is written on the doors of the Treasury vaults of the United States.

For the fiscal year from June 30, 1879, to July 1, 1880, Congress had appropriated for the star-route service $5,900,000, being every cent estimated for the needs of that service by Mr. Brady and the department. I say by Brady and the department, for whilst the department sends in the estimates, the estimates are made up in the contract office by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. For the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1879, and ending June 30, 1880, he got every farthing he asked for.

Now, what occurred? In this wild speculation after money, emboldened by success, and relieved by his audacity from apprehensions of the dangers of the law, he went on, and he not only within the first quarter or first half of that year, expended all the money appropriated for the entire year, but he contracted for a much larger sum, away beyond the appropriations.

The COURT. No, Mr. Merrick, you are mistaken.

Mr. MERRICK. He did not spend it all. He made contracts which, on the 30th of June, 1880, would have exhausted the entire fund and left the Government largely in debt on the covenants of the contracts.

The COURT. Two million dollars.

Mr. MERRICK. Two million dollars.

The COURT. The report was made to Congress in December——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I am going to read that.

The COURT. And the deficiency had not yet occurred, but the report was made for the purpose of having Congress supply the deficiency.

Mr. MERRICK. The actual deficiency in the money in December had not taken place. But the contracts, you recollect, went into operation and were to continue for four years, and in December it became manifest that those contracts thus recklessly made by Brady would, before the end of that fiscal year, not only consume all the money appropriated, but would involve the Government in liabilities upon the covenants of these contracts to the extent of $2,000,000 in excess of the amount appropriated. This he had done notwithstanding this law, which forbade him to expend in one fiscal year more than the money appropriated for that department and that purpose, and forbade him to make contracts which would involve the Government in obligations within the fiscal year to any greater extent than had been appropriated for that fiscal year. Now, gentlemen, in December, when Congress met, according to the routine of executive and legislative business, the Post-Office Department made a report to Congress of its proceedings during the preceding year.

After having made that report, without speaking of the prospective deficiency and the official delinquency that had involved the Government in this liability beyond the appropriations, they waited until some days afterwards, when the following took place. I read from page 555, a letter from Thomas J. Brady:

DECEMBER 6, 1879.

Hon. D. M. KEY, Postmaster-General:

SIR: I have the honor to state that the appropriation for inland mail transportation on star routes for the current fiscal year has proved insufficient to meet the wants of the rapidly-growing service.

The annual cost of the service now in operation is $7,620,004, while the appropriation is but $5,900,000.

Not only will the present appropriation allow no increase of mail facilities during the year—

He wrote that with a sigh, I have no doubt—but it will be necessary to curtail the existing service in order to bring its cost within the appropriation.

- That must have been very painful, because if he had been compelled to curtail there would have been some paying back of his 30 per cent:

Believing that this cannot be done without great injury to many deserving communities, and further that pressing necessity exists for increased service in many places, I venture to suggest a method of relief.

During the four fiscal years last past, viz, 1876-1879, there has been covered back into the Treasury of unexpended balances of appropriations for inland mail transportation $3,965,468.27.

During previous years the department had not exhausted all the funds given to it for inland mail transportation on the star service. Why? Because the revolution had not come. Appropriations in excess of needs had been made, and what had not been expended had been covered back into the Treasury for the reason that they had been obeying the law in regard to increase and expedition and making such increase and expedition the consequence only of an exceptional exercise of power. Brady's revolution had made, as I have said, this extreme medicine of the department its daily bread. That had not yet taken place when these unexpended balances were covered back in the Treasury:

In view of this fact, I have the honor to request your recommendation to Congress that about one-half this amount, say $2,000,000, be re-appropriated for mail transportation on star routes.

This will enable the department to maintain the present service, and besides afford a margin for reasonable and necessary increase during the remaining half of the fiscal year.

Very respectfully, &c.,

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant P. M. General.

Then, on the 8th of December, Key takes it up:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 8, 1879.

SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, calling attention to the insufficiency of the appropriation for inland mail transportation for the present fiscal year, and asking that the sum of $2,000,000 be re-appropriated out of the unexpended balances of former appropriations—

Unexpended balances of former appropriations—for that purpose, which have been covered into the Treasury, and be made available to meet the necessities of the service and of the country during the current fiscal year. I cordially indorse this recommendation, and take this occasion to suggest that the business interests of the country would be promoted by the prompt and favorable action of Congress.

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Duplicate to the United States Senate.

Now, what was done? In the first place, before considering what was done, you must bear in mind that you have the admission of a two-million-dollar deficiency upon Brady's conduct; that he had gone $2,000,000 beyond the appropriation.

Mr. WILSON. Will you not state that correctly?

Mr. BLISS. The $2,000,000 included a margin.

Mr. MERRICK. It was to include a small margin for other increases.

Mr. WILSON. $1,100,000 was really the amount.

Mr. BLISS. $1,100,000 was appropriated.

Mr. WILSON. That was appropriated to cover the service as it was.

The COURT. To cover the service already contracted for?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir. The two millions was to give a margin for further increase.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not care how it is. Suppose that is so.

Mr. WILSON. I simply want you to be accurate.

Mr. MERRICK. Counsel admits then that Brady had gone $1,100,000 beyond the appropriation. $1,100,000 was not enough. These defendants had only got four hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars a year of it as I have shown you. Their contracts had gone up from forty-odd thousand dollars to four hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars a year, and for that fiscal year they were to get four hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars. That will do me very well. I am content. He admits that Brady had gone $1,100,000 beyond the law. Am I right?

Mr. WILSON. No, you are not right.

Mr. MERRICK. Of course my Brother Wilson could not say I was right.

The COURT. That was not his admission. That was the judgment of Congress in fixing the sum.

Mr. MERRICK. He admitted he had gone two million.

The COURT. The two million was to cover his present or past contracts beyond the law and leave a reasonable margin for future increases.

Mr. MERRICK. The two million was to cover his past steals and his prospective steals. Take it that way. I do not care much how it is. But you have a declaration from Brady that he had exhausted for the fiscal year 1880 the appropriation made by Congress, or that during that fiscal year on his contracts it would be so much exhausted that there would have to be an appropriation of $2,000,000 to pay for the service and give some additional service. Mr. Wilson says that $1,100,000 was the amount to make good the contracts then made by Brady.

Mr. WILSON. I think you are inaccurate.

Mr. MERRICK. If I am, correct me, and I will admit it.

Mr. WILSON. You are inaccurate in just this: that he says if the service is maintained it will at the end of the fiscal year amount to that much and there will not be sufficient money by so much. Then he says, "If Congress don't want this service we will reduce it so that it will come within the appropriation."

Mr. MERRICK. He does not say that.

Mr. WILSON. See if he does not.

Mr. MERRICK. Does he?

Mr. WILSON. Read it.

Mr. MERRICK. If he does I have missed it; I would like to see it.

It will be necessary to curtail the existing service in order to bring its cost within the appropriation.

Mr. WILSON. In order to keep it within the appropriation.

Mr. MERRICK. That is it.

Mr. WILSON. That is it exactly.

Mr. MERRICK. To curtail the existing service, when on his contracts, by their covenant, each contractor had bound himself to carry this mail, and if it was curtailed Brady would have to pay a month's extra pay to each contractor for doing nothing.

Mr. WILSON. To the extent of the curtailment.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; he would have to pay to that extent. He had bargained away the money of the United States. He had given the additional service, and then went to Congress and said, "I have done this in my high mightiness as against the law that forbade me to exceed the appropriation. I have done it. Yes. I want $2,000,000 more. If you don't give it to me I will ruin the service. I have made my contracts, and if you don't succumb to the mandate of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and give me the money I will not maintain the service." What then? "I will pay a month's extra pay all around to the contractors I have discharged because you do not help me. Dare to refuse me!" What followed? I will show you what followed and how Congress acted. It is an interesting piece of history, and it comes in to answer that bold inquiry of Mr. Wilson, "Show me where my client has violated the law." Show me in this record where he has conformed to the law!

Mr. WILSON. You cannot show where he has ever violated it.

Mr. MERRICK. Gentlemen, what do you think of that? What do you think of that? If I was not so much occupied with my case I might do as Mr. Ingersoll did. He first undertook to convict Rerdell, and then made a dash at Brother Ker and Brother Bliss, and did not seem to be particularly anxious about defending the defendants. I might go on now and convict Brother Wilson; but I have charity for him with all his faults. A merciful humanity with me throws its mantle over a great many things! Now, let us see what was done by Congress? When that extraordinary piece of dynamite exploded in the House of Representatives fifty men were on their feet at once. "In the name of all that is good and great, and especially the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the land, what does this mean?" said one or two of those gentlemen in Congress. "We know something. They have got more papers in the Post-Office Department than we know about." Said Brady, "I don't mean anything. That is all right." "Oh, no. Let us have a committee to investigate this transaction. Congress cannot stand seeing the law trampled under foot. Above all things, the legislative department of the Government cannot permit the executive department to transcend the appropriations and then come to us and say, 'If you don't give us a deficiency certain service we are authorized to take charge of will be ruined.' That would in effect give to the executive department control of the public purse. That we never can consent shall be done. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General that now makes this report to Congress for money for his deficiency within six months after the beginning of the fiscal year took an oath to support the Constitution and obey the laws of the land. One law forbade him to do this thing which he now asks us to condone—one of the laws he swore to support. He has violated that law. Let us have an investigation into this thing." Some time in December, shortly after this report came in, a committee was ordered to investigate the matter. Mr. Blackburn, of Kentucky, was chairman of the committee. That committee sat through winter's snow and spring-time buds examining this question. They had Mr. Brady before it. As you are aware, upon Mr. Bliss's cross-examination, he asked Mr. Brady if he had not testified to certain things before that committee. They had some of these routes before them. It was difficult, in fact utterly impossible, for them to get at the truth. They just scratched the surface and that was all, for these officials, gentlemen, are so slippery that it needs a well-sanded hand to hold them while they wriggle. But the committee got at enough to satisfy it that the whole atmosphere of the Post-Office Department was impregnated with fraud and criminality, at least that part of the department which was under the management of Thomas J. Brady. What did Congress do in consequence of the examinations of that committee? It passed a law which Mr. Brady on the witness-stand openly announced to you as a vindication of his conduct. Let us see what that law is, gentlemen of the jury, and consider how far it does vindicate his conduct. First, let me say to you—and although it is a momentary digression, I am sure it will hardly take your thought from the line of my remarks—that these contracts seem to have been in trouble from the day of their birth. They were conceived in iniquity and born in sin, and they have had trouble ever since they commenced to breathe the breath of life. In 1877 there was a Congressional investigation in reference to them for the reason that Peck's name appears to the bids and Peck was not here to sign his name.

The COURT. That was in 1878.

Mr. MERRICK. Was it 1878?

The COURT. I believe so.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, you are right. In 1878 the bids were put in. Boone, before whom the acknowledgments were taken, and who certified to the acknowledgments, swore before you, as was understood at that time to be the fact, that Peck never did appear before him and acknowledge the papers. On this trial we have developed in truth, under oath, of what was then suspected, that Peck's name to those bids, in one or two or more cases, were signed by S. W. Dorsey. But that investigation passed away. Now comes the second investigation, in the winter of 1879-'80. I will read to you the law that Congress passed on that subject. It is dated the 7th of April, 1880. I ask your patient attention to this law because it becomes important:

AN ACT to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for the transportation of mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., &c., That the sum of $1,100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year.

Now, that looks very much like an approval of Brady's conduct I confess, but let us proceed a little further:

During the remainder of the current fiscal year no further expediting of service on any postal route shall be made.

What does that look like? "Mr. Brady, you have caught Congress in an awkward position. We find we will have to appropriate money to pay for those contracts that you have fraudulently and unlawfully made or else the public service will suffer. We regard them as wrong and we condemn your conduct, but we cannot do anything at present with what is in the past. We will deal with you in the future. We will at least stop the highest flings of your wild dance. No more expediting during this fiscal year, sir. We have looked into it and we find fraud. Although we must suffer and pay for the fraud, or else experience still more acute suffering, you shall perpetrate no more of this fraud. You shall not expedite any more under any circumstances during this fiscal year." A plain, distinct, and unequivocal condemnation of his conduct by the Congress of the United States, and now he swears it was a vindication. I have often thought that he is entitled to some charitable consideration from having such a lack of wit in the way of moral perception that he cannot distinguish between right and wrong. It must be true that he cannot distinguish between commendation and condemnation.

Second, that the further sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated as aforesaid to enable the Postmaster-General to place new service as authorized by law.

What does that mean? Brady tells you he was so busy in expediting and increasing and in transcending the appropriations for that period that he could not put service on all the routes that Congress had provided for.

Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall not have the power to expedite the service under any contract either now existing or hereafter given to a rate of pay exceeding 50 per centum upon the contract as originally let.

That is Mr. Brady's commendation. He expedited 150, 250, 400, 500 per cent. Congress says that hereafter and forever there shall be no expedition except at the rate of 50 per cent. upon the original contract. If the original contract price is $500, when you come to expedite you shall only pay $250 for it. Brady took the original contract of $500 and on the false affidavits of his co-conspirators, as I have shown to you, expedited and duplicated until he ran up the amount to $50,000 in some cases. Congress, having looked over the whole field and seen the operations of fraud, seen the machinery by which this fraud was conducted and seen its achievements, said, "We can no longer trust you under the act already in existence, because you have plainly violated that law and pretended to sustain yourself by affidavits you knew to be false. We cannot longer trust you, and we cannot be sure of the official who succeeds you. Therefore on the testimony in the investigation according to our best judgment as to what ought to be paid for expedition, we say that no more than 50 per cent. shall ever be paid on the original cost of the contract."

It is a little after one o'clock, your honor, and I wish to avoid tiring the jury, for I shall be obliged to continue, I say to your honor, for probably two days more.

The COURT. It is very polite for you to say so. We will take our recess.

At this point (1 o'clock and 5 minutes) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MERRICK. [Continuing.] Fifty per cent. then, gentlemen of the jury, was the amount that Congress thought, in its best judgment, after a careful investigation, should be allowed for expedition. You will recollect that in this investigation they had Mr. Brady before the committee, and they examined him carefully in reference to all matters that had come within his knowledge and experience upon this subject, and obtained from him all the information he was willing to give. That being the judgment of Congress in reference to what ought to be paid for expedition, it may be interesting again to inquire what was Mr. Brady's judgment, sitting in the chair of executive authority and representing the office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General. According to the judgment of Congress, as I explained, if a route cost originally $1,000 the Second Assistant might pay $500 in addition for expedition, and no more. What did Brady do? On route 44160, from Canyon City to Fort McDermitt, as you are already informed, he granted an expedition of half a mile an hour, and allowed $29,950 additional for expedition alone. The original cost of this route was $2,800. 50 per cent. would have been $1,400 for expedition, but instead of $1,400 there was paid $29,950. There is another, and, as I have said to you before, quite an interesting route, one of John W. Dorsey's routes, to which I have already referred in another connection, the route from Mineral Park to Pioche. According to the original contract the time was two and seventy-six one-hundredths miles per hour, and then it was reduced to three and eighty-six one-hundredths miles per hour. That was a reduction of about one mile an hour. Suppose it to have been three miles in the first instance, and then to have been reduced or expedited to four miles an hour. What do you think it cost? For expedition, $31,161. I will refer you also to the Tres Alamos and Clifton route. It was originally two and thirty-four one-hundredths miles an hour, and was expedited to four and ninety-two one-hundredths miles an hour. The original cost was $1,568, to which was added $18,051.92 for expedition. According to the rule laid down by Congress as to the proper cost of such expedition it would have amounted to only $784. Instead of that, Brady paid for this expedition $18,051.92. That such things under the law as it now stands can never again occur, cannot weigh with you in considering what shall be done in justice for what has already transpired. Verdicts of juries and penalties of law are not administered so much for the sake of punishing crime in the individual who has committed it as for the purpose of making the commission of crime dangerous to members of society and preserving peace and good order and faithful obedience in the future to the law of the land. Ingenious devices may be invented and put into operation for the purpose of escaping the present law by any other official disposed to be regardless of his trust, as they were put into operation to escape the law existing at the time of Mr. Brady's service in office. What I have given to you as paid for expedition on these routes were the amounts paid for expedition alone, whilst at the same time, as you are aware from what I have already said, large amounts were also added for extra trips. To illustrate: The Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route was carried up from the sum of $2,800, at which it was originally taken, to $50,166. The Mineral Park and Pioche route was carried from $2,982 to $52,033.33. You can now, from what I have said to you, make a comparison of Mr. Brady's estimate of these expeditions with the estimate put by Congress upon what they ought to have been, and thus you can see that instead of its being a legislative approval of Mr. Brady's conduct, it was in fact a legislative condemnation of what he had done. Let us read a little further and see what else there is to throw light upon the inquiry as to the approbation which Mr. Brady finds in this act:

SECTION 4. Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed to affect the validity or legality of the acts or omissions of any officer of the United States or to affect any proceedings therefor.

The plain letter of the law is condemnatory of the conduct of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General throughout by the judgment of Congress, and Congress appreciated that the judicial tribunals either had or must in the future take charge and care of this subject, and appreciating that the amount of money of which the Government had plainly been defrauded ought to be recovered back, as it will be, gentlemen of the jury, on some of these routes, I trust, and appreciating also that criminal proceedings either had been or ought to be instituted against these men who have been guilty of a violation of their official trusts, and yet apprehensive that the view which Brady now takes of this law might be taken by others, provided carefully in the closing section as follows:

Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed to affect the validity or legality of the acts or omissions of any officer of the United States or to affect any proceedings therefor.

ANY PROCEEDINGS, civil or criminal. You thus see, gentlemen, that by this act Congress not only condemned what Brady did by the expression of its judgment in the sections I have read to you, but in the last section plainly, distinctly, and unequivocally declared that nothing that the act contained should enter into any consideration of a case brought before the civil or the criminal courts to protect Brady's official abuse of trust which had made the appropriation necessary to supply deficiencies on account of his dishonest and illegal orders.

Having shown to you, gentlemen of the jury, what was the view of Congress upon this subject, and having shown how Brady violated the general law made for the protection of the Treasury by limiting the departments to the expenditure of that sum alone which had been appropriated for the fiscal year, and having shown the record evidence from the Post-Office Department, I will now conduct you yet a step further and answer for you by the testimony of witnesses in the case the inquiry I have propounded: What was Brady's motive; what was his purpose and design in thus being guilty of criminal behavior in office? That these orders of Brady, founded upon false affidavits in the manipulation of which these defendants were engaged, should convince your judgment beyond a doubt that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was not exercising the function of his office for the public welfare I cannot question. We stand amazed to see that by the process I have explained nineteen contracts taken by these defendants should, from an original cost of $41,135, have been, in a little over a year from their date, raised to a cost of $538,134.55 additional, or to a cost including the original sum of $579,269.55 a year. The contracts had four years to run from their date. Bear that in mind in making the calculation. Remember the immense sum they were to draw from the Treasury within that period. That sum amounts to more than a million and a half of dollars. How and why was this? Let me ask you to consider for a little while with me the testimony of Mr. John A. Walsh.

In reference to Mr. Walsh, let me say to you, gentlemen, that he stands uncontradicted, except by Brady himself. He stands before this jury unimpeached, and his testimony was allowed to go to this jury without cross-examination—a most remarkable circumstance, especially for a witness the other side did not attempt to impeach or contradict otherwise than by a party interested in the case himself, by a party who was swearing to keep himself out of the penitentiary. In considering the force and effect of the testimony of these defendants, you must bear in mind, as I have said before in reference to other things, that the law of human nature and the known impulses of the human heart are to be taken into consideration in weighing human testimony.

“Yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life.”

Yea, all that a man hath will he give to save himself from crossing the threshold of a penitentiary, I may add. These defendants, including Brady, when they were testifying before you were testifying in the belief and the conviction that on what they said depended their liberty. They were swearing to protect their liberty, and I ask you, in weighing their testimony, from what you know of men and human nature, to bear in mind that there are but few men in this world who have that elevated standard of morality, that pure and independent and inflexible purpose and character, rendering them capable of resisting the temptation of perjury to protect themselves from the instantaneously impending ruin. The avalanche is hanging above them, and its frail links may be melted by the truth. If they feel that those links can be welded by falsehood, will they not tell the falsehood to save themselves from ruin? Brady is the only man testifying in contradiction of Walsh, whilst Walsh is sustained first by the circumstance that they did not cross-examine him. Why? For the reason that actuates every counsel in reference to some witnesses, namely, that he knows the cross-examination of a witness testifying distinctly and clearly would only deepen his testimony instead of effacing it or rendering it doubtful. The counsel for the defendants were wise, discreet, and judicious, and showed themselves to be capable and competent advocates, for they knew, from their past experience in another trial, that the cross-examination of that man would only deepen his testimony in chief.

Mr. WILSON. Is that proper, your honor?

The COURT. I think so.

Mr. MERRICK. They knew from their experience in many trials——

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] Is a reference to what happened in the first trial proper?

Mr. MERRICK. I speak of your experience.

The COURT. I understand him to be engaged in making comments upon your omission to cross-examine Walsh.

Mr. WILSON. I am not complaining of that.

The COURT. Very well.

Mr. MERRICK. They knew it from their large experience as advocates in many trials. They are men of large experience, men of large learning, men of power, and men of eloquence. They knew what witness to drop and what witness to take up. They spent three, or four, or five days on one witness, and they spent two days on another witness. Wherever they thought a witness was vulnerable, wherever they thought, on cross-examination, they could weaken his testimony there they brought forth the ingenuity, and the learning, and the experience of accomplished advocates to perform the task as well as it could be performed. But knowing, from the manner in which Walsh testified, from the bearing of the man, and from the character of the man, that cross-examination could not shake the solid truth he had told, but only swell its magnitude, increase its impression, and deepen its recollection in the minds of the jury, they let him go without a single word of inquiry. I thought at the time that was done that surely something was in store to destroy him; that surely there must be something of which I had never heard, but which was known to the counsel on the other side, that would break down his evidence. But when the case closed without that testimony coming forward or being developed, and when I found that I was mistaken in my supposition, I stood amazed at what had been done, but stood in profound admiration of the skill which had seemingly admitted the truth which it knew it could not shake.

Now, gentlemen, how is Walsh confirmed? He is confirmed by the records I have shown you. Gentlemen, I still stand upon the solid foundation of the case I have built since I started some days ago. That solid foundation I stand upon at every step, and on that solid foundation I am building and shall continue to build. From the foundation that I have thus far built it has become apparent to you that the orders passed by Brady cannot be accounted for upon any principle of integrity and honor in official authority, and that those orders cannot by any possibility be accounted for consistently with Brady's innocence and patriotism and duty in the discharge of his trust. We must account for them in some other way. Walsh comes now and answers from the evidence given on the witness-stand as to the motive of Brady, and makes plain, by Brady's own declaration, those speculative causes of action, those views and opinions of Brady in reference to his power and in reference to the influence in respect of petitions and Congressional solicitations. He makes all that plain from Brady's own admission to him. I will not trouble you by going very much into detail in reference to his testimony, as I do not trouble you in going much in detail with regard to anything. My time will not permit it. But I must read to you, instead of repeating it, what he says, that you may have it accurately before you.

The COURT. What page do you propose to read from?

Mr. MERRICK. I propose to begin on page 2207, and read a few extracts. It seems, gentlemen of the jury, that in December, 1880, Walsh addressed a note to General Brady notifying him that he desired to meet him at Sheridan's office at 1 p. m., and requested that he would send back word by the bearer. That note was taken to Brady, and when the note was handed back by the bearer to Walsh it bore upon it this inscription:

Will be there at 12.30—in Brady's handwriting. Brady does not contradict that writing, if I mistake not. He does not deny the appointment. Walsh says the appointment was made. Walsh swears that the acquiescence in the appointment by him, "Will be there at 12.30," is in Brady's handwriting. That is not contradicted by Brady. He was there. They therefore had the interview. The question is what passed at the interview. I read from page 2207—

Q. Will you be so good as to detail all that passed at that interview?

He then goes on and speaks on some general subjects that were discussed as preliminary to the important part of the conversation, and continues as follows:

We may have and probably did discuss some other subjects before coming to the point, which was the payment of the notes of General Brady that I held, amounting to about $25,000.

Gentlemen, excuse me if I ask that you give me your particular attention. Indeed I take that back, for you have been so kind to me that I ought not to seem to think you have not been by such a request.

General Brady asked me if I had the memoranda or data with me. I responded that I had. I had the notes in my pocket. I had also memoranda as to other amounts than expressed in the notes. Mr. Brady sat there listening to me. I told him that everything was pretty well determined except as to the matter of interest; that there was no interest expressed on the face of the notes; that that matter had been held in abeyance and that now would be a proper time to adjust it; that the time had come when I desired the payment of the notes, for the reason, among others, that I needed money. Mr. Brady sat there very calmly at the table turning the papers over in his hands and putting them down; he looked at me inquiringly and asked me if I was in earnest. I told him yes, I thought I was. He asked me if I did not think that that matter had been pretty well and fairly liquidated.

He asked me if I did not think that matter had been pretty well and fairly liquidated.

I asked him to explain. He entered into an explanation without any sort of hesitation. He reminded me of the fact that I was in the enjoyment of a very remunerative contract.

Q. What contract was that?—A. From Albuquerque, New Mexico, to Prescott, Arizona.

Q. You held that contract?—A. Yes, sir; at that time. He informed me that he had expedited that very largely, had increased the service; the pay had been largely increased as the result, and that he did not really think that he owed me anything; that he did not see how I thought he could possibly owe me. I reminded him of the facts as I had repeatedly told him, that the contract, even viewed from that standpoint, was unremunerative; that it had been a source of no profit to me; on the contrary, a loss; that he himself was largely instrumental in my ever having entered into it—

I will show you presently that they were bosom friends, and Brady persuaded him into it—and that I felt that such increase and expedition as had been accorded me was made under the law. He smiled at that, and asked me if I had not seen cases where petitions, &c., very numerous and largely signed, had not effected any result whatever. He then referred to the fact that after he had cut my trips down from 1876, all the petitions that had come from that country had not succeeded. He said, in brief, that the matter of petitions was simply to enable him to act within the law, and that any man might have understood that, not seeing half as much as I had. I asked him what he meant by saying what I had seen. He referred me to the Price and Peterson drafts, and said that I ought to have been able to have divined from them what was the custom.

The custom! The CUSTOM!

I asked him what was the custom; that I still could not understand from those drafts; all I knew was the existence of the drafts, but how they came to be made, and what they were made for, was none of my affair and none of my business; that he had turned them over to me to his credit, and that it was not my province as a banker to inquire into the cause of their being made.

You recollect there was an offer to prove all about those drafts, and the court would not allow us to prove it.

The COURT. You cannot comment on it, either.

Mr. MERRICK. I shall not comment on it, but was merely stating the fact lest some juror should ask, "Why didn't you prove it."

He told me that my affectation of not knowing what the terms were was rather ridiculous; that I should know. I told him that I did not. He said that the amount that he exacted as a rule was 20 per cent. of the amount of the pay that was increased [the total increase of pay over the original contract]—20 per centum of that multiplied by the term of the contract.

Then he goes on to state that Brady made a calculation on the basis of 20 per cent. upon the increase that had been made to him, not charging him, however, with the increase that had been given to McDonough before he took the contract, which had already been paid for, but charging him with the expedition and increase that had been given by Brady's orders to Walsh whilst he had the contract, and said then that the amount more than covered the notes, and therefore as Walsh was bound to pay him for the orders on his route the sum of 20 per cent. upon the total amount of expedition, and as that amount when calculated up more than covered the notes, he owed Walsh nothing; that Walsh ought to have known that fact, and ought to have known that that was his custom.

Q. Are you giving now what General Brady said?—A. Yes, sir. The difference between $74,000, in round numbers, the figure from which the pay had been last increased to $135,000, in round numbers, amounted to about $30,000.

You see it was a very valuable route.

Brady then took the notes and put them in his pocket.

He said he meant to make a settlement of that in that way; that that was a settlement of it; that that account was audited, and was dismissed. I asked him if he thought that I was going to submit to that. He asked me what I could do. Well, I suggested mildly that I might go to the court. He remarked that I might go there, and perhaps it was all the good it would do me; that probably I ought to have learned enough by this time to find out that appeals to any of these tribunals were not productive of any great results.

On page 2211 he says further:

Q. You have already stated that, and in a connection where it is appreciable, I think. Did he say anything about what you may have supposed to have been his reason for making these expeditions?—A. Oh, well, he said that he didn't think for a moment that I thought it afforded him any amusement to make expedition. I told him that I didn't know that I did, but I supposed the law directed him. He said that petitions simply enabled him to act within the law; that the petitions were matter of form. The petitions worked all right if it was all right; and when it was not, they didn't.

The petitions worked all right when it was all right, AND WHEN IT WAS NOT THEY DID NOT. Why work all right at one time and not at another? Because they were matters of form. The 20 or 30 per cent. was the substance. The petitions were all right when accompanied by the substance of 20 per cent. paid to Brady on the increases; but when not accompanied by the substance they did not work all right at all. He was a man of substance and not a man of form. The learned counsel who addressed you so earnestly on behalf of the defendants said, "Look at John A. Walsh and tell me that he allowed Brady to take his notes and go off without knocking him down," or something to that effect. "Look at him. He is an athlete. Had he been living in the days when the coliseum flourished in Rome he would have been a gladiator." Well, he is a fine figure of a man, and so is Brady, and the American citizen who could believe that he might have indulged in gladiatorial exercise in the arena of Rome and undertakes to tackle Brady's three hundred pounds undertakes a serious task.

The COURT. Not three hundred.

Mr. MERRICK. I am expediting. I have got into that habit.

The COURT. I think if you put on three hundred pounds you would destroy expedition.

Mr. MERRICK. Say two hundred and fifty or two hundred. Brady is a good-sized man. Brady is a muscular fellow, and brave, too, to do the things that he did. A man of ordinary courage might confront his equal in stature and physical strength, but it requires vast courage combined with grand audacity to do what Brady did. No, sir; the reason Walsh did not take those notes from him, as possibly he might have done under other circumstances, was this: Walsh had that route, which he had taken at Brady's suggestion, and which had been run up, as I have shown you, to $135,000 per annum. He had invested in that route nearly all he had or everything he had in the world, and it remained with Brady by a single stroke of the pen to ruin that man, and ultimately he did ruin him. Walsh knew that as between him and Brady the physical struggle for the repossession of those notes might have resulted in Walsh's victory over Brady. What then? The darkened eye from the blow could still see to write the record, and the hand guided by malice could have stricken Walsh down on the instant, a hopelessly ruined man. "Take the notes and go. I will trust to the future. I cannot peril my all against your wrath and your power." He let him take them. He tried to compromise. He worried along, and ultimately when he was ruined he brought his suit in the courts, where it is now pending, to recover back the amount.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, I do not mean to say that Brady in that interview with Walsh may not have been all right according to the condition of things as he understood that condition. I do not mean to say that Brady may not, and I do not mean to say that he did not honestly believe that those notes were liquidated. He had wanted money and Walsh had given him money, and Walsh had taken Brady's notes. When Walsh asked Brady to give him the notes for the money that he loaned him, Brady understood the least said to be the soonest mended, and that he only wanted the notes for a cover to conceal the fraud. He thought, "He ought to understand just as I do and I will give him the notes. They are mere matters of form, because yesterday, or day before, I gave him expedition which will pay him infinitely more than the amount." Brady may have understood and no doubt did understand when the notes were given that they would never be paid; that they were a mere cover to shield him if he should be accused of having granted this expedition for pay or should ever be arraigned for receiving money from Walsh; that he would then have the notes to produce and show that it was an honorable transaction, a simple loan. But the notes were only to be used in vindication of Brady and not as evidences of debt, which Brady was in any way bound to pay. I have not any doubt that such was Mr. Brady's view and opinion, and Mr. Walsh ought to have understood from what he did know of the Price and Peterson drafts that such was Brady's view and opinion. Now, what does Brady say upon the subject? I read from page 3562:

Q. You never received any money from him?—A. I never received any money from him.

Q. You never wrote to him for any money?—A. I do not think I ever wrote him for any money. I once asked him to loan me some stock. He was always professing his willingness to loan me some money, but I do not think I ever asked him to loan me any money.

That is what Brady says. At the same time he admits that the note is in his handwriting.

Mr. WILSON. Are you not mistaken?

Mr. BLISS. He does not deny it.

Mr. MERRICK. I think he admits it.

Q. I show you a letter and ask you to look at it and the envelope and state whether they are not in your handwriting.—A. This is asking him to loan me——

Q. No matter what it is asking; is it in your handwriting?—A. I believe it is in my handwriting,

Q. Signed by you?—A. I think so.

Q. Is the envelope your handwriting?—A. It looks like my handwriting.

That is the ginger letter, I expect. Now, we will come to the ginger letter. I am much obliged to Mr. Wilson.

Mr. WILSON. I thought you were mistaken.

Mr. MERRICK. I am. I do not deny it. Perhaps he was not asked about the other note.

Mr. WILSON. He was not asked about it.

Mr. MERRICK. This is the ginger letter, and there is a good deal of ginger in it. Brady says, "I never asked him to lend me money, although he was always proposing to do so. I never got any money from him. I hadn't that kind of relation with him." That was the purport of his testimony. Now about this letter. Mr. Bliss read it to the jury, and I will read it to the jury, to show the relations of these men—their fraternal relations—and how natural a thing it was for Walsh to let Brady have his money, and thus to show you that, what would naturally occur between two men in their relations to each other is precisely what Walsh said did occur between him and Brady in the incipency of those transactions and what from day to day occurred between them down to the time when Brady met him at Sheridan's and when Brady put the notes in his pocket. The envelope is addressed to "Mr. John Walsh, present," and has a monogram, T. J. B., stamped upon it. The letter is as follows:

MY DEAR WALSH: The Chatt. people send for me to be in New York to-morrow.

"The Chatt. people" meant the Chattanooga Railroad people.

We propose to make an effort to put it up this week. I am in need of "ginger."

"Ginger" is what I want. "GINGER," Walsh, "GINGER." "Ginger" is what I want.

Can't you loan me your Chatt., for which I will give you my obligation at what you paid for it, and will also account to you for any profits made.

"I will give you my obligation." I will give you my note for the amount that you paid for it if you will let me have it.

With that I can raise what I need to help in the movement.

To put it up in Wall street. They were going to have a corner in "Chatt."

The trouble is that my means—

Now we come to something interesting—are in Am. U. Tel., and the bonds and stock are not yet issued. When issued will give me one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty thousand dollars—

Where did he get it all from? Where did this man, who was originally supervisor of internal revenue at $3,000 a year, and Second Assistant Postmaster-General at $3,500, get this money from?

but this may not be for sixty or ninety days and hence not available. My telephone bonds—

That was another investment—are already up as collateral, and with buying newspapers, a mine, or rather part of one (the P. & D.)—

The Pelican and Dives, I think it is—and running the lumber business, I am a little cramped.

I should think he would be. He was Second Assistant Postmaster-General, with one hundred and thirty odd thousand dollars tied up in American Union Telegraph stock, with lots of telephone bonds all up as collateral, buying a newspaper, buying a mine, and running the lumber business. He said, "I am a little cramped. I want ginger to run this machine. I want some stimulant. The work is too heavy. I am a little cramped." That shows you to some extent the measure of his fortune. Ginger is good for cramps. It is one of the best remedies in the world.

The COURT. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. MERRICK. It is not dated. I do not know that the date was established. Walsh did not fix the date. I am inclined to think it was just prior to this interview in December. That is my recollection. Has your honor any recollection of it at all, because you are very accurate in your recollection of these facts?

The COURT. No; I have no recollection of the date of that ginger letter, and it seems to me now that it has no date.

Mr. MERRICK. It has no date, but I think Walsh said it as just before that interview in December, 1880. That is my impression. Brother Bliss will look that up while I go on.

Help me if you can. It will be helping yourself if we succeed in Chatt., of which I have no doubt.

Yours, etc.,

BRADY.

The COURT. Of course it must have been prior to the interview.

Mr. MERRICK. Prior to the interview, and, therefore, in that same December.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, do you not think, if Brady could write such a letter as that to Mr. Walsh, that those two men, Brady and Walsh, stood in those relations, the one to the other, that would justify the one in borrowing money from the other? Do you not think, if Brady could write that letter to Walsh, that those two men stood in such relations to each other that they could communicate confidentially in reference to money matters? Brady is in distress, his money tied up in the American Union Telegraph, in the telephone, in mines, and in newspapers that have been pouring out their villainous calumny upon jury, court, and counsel since this star-route case began—newspapers bought to help him in the perpetration of his frauds upon the Treasury of the United States, and to assail every man that dare disclose his villainy, do you not think, if he could write that letter to Walsh, that they were in such close relations that confidential money transactions could take place between them? What does he say to Walsh? “I am sinking under this load, and upon you, of all the world, I call to help me.”

Mr. BLISS. As to the date, I think the only evidence is this, on page 3579. He is asked how he knew Mr. Walsh got any Chatt. stock:

Q. Do you remember when that stock was bought?—A. I do not, distinctly. It was some time, I think, during the summer or fall of 1880; I can't say exactly.

Q. How did you know it was bought?—A. Mr. Walsh visited me at Messrs. Hatch & Foote's, where I generally rendezvoused while in New York, one morning, and asked me if I thought Chatt. was a good purchase that morning, and I told him I thought it was, and he sat right down there and bought it.

Q. Was not that the 11th day of December, 1880?—A. I do not think it was so late as that, but I am not certain. I have not a very distinct recollection of the time that it was bought.

Q. It was bought through Hatch & Foote?—A. It was bought through Hatch & Foote, and was paid for on the spot.

He was seeking to borrow “Chatt.” stock.

Mr. WILSON. At the time of the purchase.

Mr. MERRICK. It must have been after the purchase that Brady wanted to borrow.

The COURT. I was not interrogating as to the date of the interview.

Mr. BLISS. Twenty-eighth of December, 1880.

The COURT. I thought so.

Mr. MERRICK. That gives me another thought. And it is strange, gentlemen, that every incident that takes place in this case operates to develop the truth of the theory of the prosecution. What have we here? We have here Walsh going to Brady to know whether he intended to buy “Chatt.” stock. What have we there? Brady writing to Walsh in this confidential relation to borrow “Chatt.” stock. Mutual friends consulting about topics of common interest, each asking the other for advice and for help, and probably at a later day reciprocating and exchanging questions—Brady asking Walsh for advice and Walsh asking Brady for advice. Were they not closely bound and closely knit together? But they fell out, because Walsh would not accept Brady's theory of his obligation to pay the tax which Brady levied for the expedition of his route.

Now, how else is Walsh confirmed as against Brady? For you must bear in mind, gentlemen, that whilst Brady stands before you in the manner in which I have described, with all his feelings stimulated to tell that which would help himself, with an overpowering interest to constrain if not to pervert the truth, and therefore needing corroboration in your judgment, as he must in the judgment of all sensible men, yet he stands before you uncorroborated, while the other man, Walsh, stands corroborated by the record proof, by the “ginger” letter, by the close relations in which he had stood to Brady; and further and beyond that corroborated on the main point by Brady's receipt of money for this expedition granted to the contractors, by other written evidence in the case and by evidence furnished by one of his co-conspirators.

If I ever felt a profound sympathy for a witness seeking on the stand to evade the terrible effect of a truth he could not deny, by flimsy and insufficient explanations, I pitied Miner when he undertook to explain away the letters he had written to Hayes. What were they? They come in here, gentlemen, with emphatic and terrific confirmation of what Walsh has said, and what Walsh has said flies back to emphasize the letters. Not only that, but they both together confirm what Moore said Dorsey told him in his interview with Dorsey, when he came back from the West, and before he made the second trip to the West in the summer of 1878. First, then, let me read Miner's letter to Hayes—the letter of one of these defendants to a subcontractor on his route. Hayes, I think, was a subcontractor on one of the routes of which Miner had charge here in Washington. On September 19, 1878, the defendant, Miner, wrote as follows (page 1822):

J. C. HAYES, Esq.,
San Luis Rey, Cal.:

DEAR SIR: Yours first and fourth received. Increased speed is very seldom ordered, and never without special labor here and—never without special labor and considerable expense.

What, gentlemen of the jury?

Expense for what? How he twisted and how he turned when the question was asked! "Oh, for living here," this, that, and the other. That would not do. Various other excuses were given, but they would not do, and he saw they would not do, as my cross-examination struck out the substance and left nothing behind but the form. Finally, says he, in explanation, "I do not always tell the truth when I ain't under oath." He meant to say to this jury, and to impress upon you the belief, that when he wrote that letter in September, 1878, he had deliberately lied to Hayes, and he told you so in so many words. Gentlemen of the jury, in my humble opinion, a man who does not tell the truth in the business relations of his life when not under oath will lie when he is sworn. This was a business transaction between him and a man that he had in his employ, and he told you that, not being under oath, he had lied, and that he had lied in order to deceive or to bring down from his position his employé serving him on the Pacific coast. Now, I say to you, gentlemen, as business men, every one of you, however we may in our social relations indulge the faculty of imagination, the man who, in his business relations, when making a bargain with another, will tell a falsehood, will commit perjury on the stand. That man could not be credited in a court of justice, and his carcass should be thrown beyond the reach of the court's limits. Why is it, gentlemen of the jury, that when you want to impeach a witness you call two or three witnesses to the stand to inquire as to the character of John Jones or of John R. Miner for truth and veracity, you ask: "Do you know John Jones among his people?" "Yes." "What is his character?" "His character is that he will lie." What does that mean? That among the people with whom he lives, in the serious transactions of life, he has lied. When you prove by two or three or four witnesses on the stand that he has won that character by lying, in reference to the serious transactions of life, his testimony is at once trampled under foot, and he is regarded as not worthy of belief. But I do not call witnesses here to give evidence upon that subject. I take John R. Miner himself. He himself has given the best evidence of his character for truth and veracity. He says he lied, and in a serious business transaction with a person whom he had employed, in order to get the advantage of that person or in order to prevent that person getting the advantage of him.

Miner is not a stranger to courts of justice. His position here is no novelty to him. He has stood at the bar of justice before, as he told you on the witness stand, indicted and arraigned for defrauding the revenues of the United States, and succeeded in escaping the penitentiary, in all probability, by paying $1,800, the amount of which he had defrauded the Treasury, and getting a nolle prosequi upon the indictment in consideration of paying that sum back which he had stolen. He is no novice in this business. He is an astute man in affairs like this, and as familiar with the precincts of courts of justice as he is with the diplomatic use of his tongue in reference to truth or falsehood.

But he did not tell a story when he wrote Hayes that letter. He told the truth. He said it required "special labor here and considerable expense." Now recollect, gentlemen of the jury, he could not account for the expense, to save his life, and was driven to this resort to get rid of the force and effect of the testimony in the case. What was the expense? Walsh tells you, what the expense was. The expense was the percentage upon the increases obtained; the expense was the toll levied by Brady; the expense was the amount these conspirators had agreed to give Brady. These contractors divided up the allowances. It was not all clean profit to them. That was the expense. Can you get rid of it, gentlemen of the jury?

The COURT. Mr. Merrick, the point was made, I believe, by the defense, that this story of Walsh could not be true in fact, or the statement made by Brady to Walsh was not the statement of a truth, for the reason that if Brady accepted the 30 per cent. of the allowances for expedition in each case, after paying the subcontractor, and other items, it would leave nothing for the contractor, so there would be no object in the contractor paying such a sum of money to Mr. Brady?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, your honor, I remember it.

The COURT. I thought I would call your attention to that.

Mr. MERRICK. I remember it. That was reasoned upon in this way: That 65 per cent. was paid to the subcontractor. Was a contract shown to you of that kind? It was reasoned upon the basis of what Boone said, that Dorsey had told him to insert 65 per cent. in that new covenant of the contract. I showed you the contract and I showed you that in that new covenant there was no insertion of 65 per cent. at all. And the testimony showed you—to which I have not yet come—that Dorsey told Moore when going West to make these sub-contracts at 40 per cent., and Moore did make them at 40 per cent., and when I come to consider Moore's testimony I will use that fact that he made the contracts at 40 per cent. in corroboration of his interview with Dorsey, which Dorsey denies. There is but one single contract in this whole case for 65 per cent. That is the contract on the route from Kearney to Kent, where the contract was made to pay French 65 per cent. of the expedition. But they cheated him out of it; they never told him expedition had been made; they kept the money in their own pockets. The subcontracts were in many cases made with the subcontractors for the purpose of cheating them, and a good part of the evidence in reference to what they received was excluded by the court. The case of French came in. French was the only living creature that ever had a contract of that kind, and he was cheated out of every farthing of it, and now has a suit pending, in the ultimate hope that he may recover it. Brady's share was 30 per cent.; the subcontractors got a certain per cent., say 40. They were to get it, but never did; and then the residue was to be distributed among the contractors. Brady got the lion's share, beyond doubt, because he did the lion's work. He was the lion. He had the power. All the others had to do was what seemed to Miner and John W. Dorsey to be a facile task—to commit perjury as occasion required. That was their daily moral food.

On Redding to Alturas the subcontract called upon the contractors to pay the subcontractor $4,000 for expedition. The contractor received $18,000. That does not look very much as if there was any trouble about the division, your honor.

The COURT. Was that $18,000 on account of expedition alone?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLISS. They got, on Redding to Alturas, for three trips and expedition, $26,946.66. The trips were $2,994 each. The three trips would be about $9,000, and they were paid $26,946.66.

Mr. MERRICK. How much were they to pay the subcontractor? Four thousand dollars. How was it on the Camp McDermitt route? Vaile admits $20,000 of profit on Camp McDermitt; the contract shows $30,000. I read to you the profits from a paper, and I probably will recur to that paper. I hardly thought it worth while, with a jury as intelligent as this, that had paid such careful attention as it went along, to answer such an argument made by Mr. Ingersoll. I determined, when I commenced to prepare the form of this argument, that if I went over all the details and swept away all the rubbish, piece by piece, that had been piled up before this jury, it would take me twelve months; but that by discussing some few general questions applicable to the entire mass of evidence I could explain it all in all its bearings, in some three, or four, or five days. I am very glad that the court called my attention to the particular fact of which I have been speaking. I am obliged to his honor, for it enables me to clear that up, when I should not have reached it until later in the argument, and this brief explanation of it will save me some time hereafter.

I wanted to read to you precisely what Miner said in his explanation. I have not a reference to the page upon my notes. So, while Mr. Bliss is looking for it, for me, I will pass on, and recur to it presently.

What says Moore in reference to this subject, as to his interview with Stephen W. Dorsey? At page 1374, your honor will find it:

Q. Did you have any conversation with him about your profits, &c.?

That is the question propounded to Mr. Moore.

A. Yes, sir; I made the same proposition to him that I had to Mr. Miner, or that Mr. Miner had made to me. I told him I was willing to give my time, but my expenses must be taken out of the general fund before there was a division of profits. Mr. Dorsey told me he acquiesced in that, and said I must understand another thing, that it required money to hold the influence they all had with the department, and that must be taken out of the general fund before the division of profits.

Do you understand that?

The COURT. That was the first conversation, in the spring of 1878, was it?

Mr. MERRICK. That was the conversation, I think, after his return, when he was talking about making these contracts.

The COURT. I think he returned here in July, 1878.

Mr. MERRICK. July, 1878; that is it, sir.

Mr. BLISS. Before he went out again.

Mr. MERRICK. Before he went out again.

The COURT. That was in April.

Mr. MERRICK. No; this is after his return here and before he went back, I think.

Mr. BLISS. Yes, you are right.

Mr. MERRICK. It was between his two visits.

Mr. Dorsey told me he acquiesced in that, and said I must understand another thing, that it required money to hold the influence they all had with the department, and that must be taken out of the general fund before the division of profits.

Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey denies that any such conversation ever took place. Again, Stephen W. Dorsey is swearing to keep himself out of the penitentiary; and I will show you when I come to consider Stephen W. Dorsey, the teacher, and Montfort C. Rerdell, the pupil, and trace them down and show their sweet relations in reference to this subject, that wherever a question is asked Stephen W. Dorsey that is to his benefit he gives a prompt and decided answer, and where there is one asked that looks the other way he seeks refuge under the subterfuge, "I don't remember." Is not Moore, in reference to this conversation with S. W. Dorsey, corroborated in a certain respect by the Hayes letter and by Walsh? Was it not a fact that they needed money to hold their influence in the department? That is our principal inquiry. Does not Walsh tell you that Brady himself told him so? Does not Miner tell you that it was so? Does not Miner say to you, speaking in his letter to Hayes, that it required considerable expense here to get expedition, and thus confirm Walsh? And do they not, both united, confirm and establish the fact that they did need money? When Moore was bargaining with Dorsey to become a participant in the speculation was it not a most natural thing for Dorsey to tell what was the truth—that it took money to keep their influence with the department? Can you escape it? Is there on that jury a single man that now doubts it, after we have gone over all the record and confirmed the record by the parol testimony? Is there any doubt even among the two or three hoped-for deliverers? What has been done once cannot always be done again. I say there is not a man on that jury that, in his mind and conscience, doubts for a minute the conclusive and unquestioned character of this proof that orders for expedition did need money to bring them forth.

Now, let me do justice to Mr. Miner. I would not, for any consideration in the world, add a single feather to the heavy weight that is on his shoulders. I could not do him worse than ask for justice. Let me read what he says at page 4274:

Q. What do you mean in this letter to Hayes by saying:

"Increases can only be obtained by our joint effort. They are based upon petitions from citizens along the route, but it requires active work here to consummate them."

What do you mean by "active work here?"—A. I mean what I said.

Q. You mean active work, and that is all you have to explain?—A. That is all.

Q. Look at 22 P, and tell me if that is in your handwriting.—A. That is in my writing.

That is the letter I have just alluded to:

Q. What do you mean in this letter, which is a letter to Hayes of the 19th of September, 1878, by these words:

"Increased speed is very seldom ordered, and never without special labor here and considerable expense."

A. I meant precisely what I said.

Q. "Never ordered without considerable expense here?"

What is his answer, gentlemen?

A. I meant precisely what the letter said.

Q. "Never ordered without considerable expense here?"—A. I meant precisely what the letter said.

You remember his attitude and appearance when he replied.

Q. Precisely what it said?—A. Yes, sir. If you want to know the circumstances under which that letter was written, I can tell you.

Q. You can make any explanation you want. I want to know what you meant by saying "considerable expense?"—A. I can explain the whole matter. Mr. Hayes had a postmaster out there by the name of Scipio Craig, who was a schoolmate of "Tom Brady," as he called him, and he thought that anything he asked, whether reasonable or not, could be done.

Q. And you wanted to satisfy him that it could not?—A. I wanted to satisfy him that it required the indorsements of his members of Congress from California, and there is another letter in the case that so states.

Q. Is that your only explanation?—A. That is all.

Q. What did you mean by considerable expense?

I do not generally let a witness go, if he has an explanation, until he gives it:

A. I was at the expense of living here.

Q. You meant that?—A. I did.

Q. Then if you were at the expense of living here, and you meant that only, why did you refer to the expense in connection with increased speed, and say that increased speed required special labor here and considerable expense?—A. Because his letter that that was a reply to related only to increased speed.

Q. That is your explanation, is it?—A. That is my explanation, sir.

Q. That is your explanation of why you told him that increased speed required considerable expense here?—A. Yes, sir; and furthermore, Mr. Hayes was of the opinion that if any expedition was ordered on that route he ought to have it all, and I was trying to make a good trade with him.

Q. You wanted to make him believe you were at heavy expense in order to appreciate your services and to depreciate his?—A. I did, sir.

Q. That is, you wanted to deceive him, did you?—A. It would so appear.

Q. Is it a fact?—A. I think it is.

Q. Then when you said that it required expense here you told him a lie, did you?—

A. Well, sir, I was not under oath when I wrote that letter.

Deal with him, gentlemen, deal with him as you think he ought to be dealt with.

Q. You will lie when you are not under oath, will you?—A. I have not said that I would.

Q. You have said that you told that lie and that you were not under oath?—A. I generally make the best trade I can.

He might supplement it by, "Lie or no lie." What shall we do with such witnesses as that? Experienced in criminal proceedings, making the best trade he can, lie or no lie, how much credit will you give him?

The law that authorizes a party in a criminal case to become a witness for himself is an extremely wise one in its application to many cases. It enables a man who is accused of crime, when encircled round about by treacherous enemies, with devices, through perjured statements to convict him, to explain what otherwise might remain forever unknown and to clear up the concealed and mysterious circumstances pointing to his guilt. But at the same time it is a privilege which every lawyer and statesman must recognize, puts a man in a position of sore temptation, and makes us all feel, when we see him yield to that temptation and swear falsely for his interest, how grand the prayer and how grand the statesmanship that would follow the prayer—

Lead us not into temptation.

The spirit must be strong and the character iron that can yield obedience to the solemn mandates of moral power requiring the truth to be told, when, upon the telling, follow destruction and irretrievable and hopeless ruin.

I now pass, gentlemen, to a subject especially germane to those that I have heretofore called your attention to, and that is to the general doctrine of conspiracy. As we have traveled our weary way during the last several days, you have observed all along that, without my mentioning a single word in reference to the law of conspiracy, I have gradually brought all these parties close together and shown them before you in the fraternal embrace. Indeed, I think upon one single affidavit I brought four of them together and linked them all in the fraternal concord of criminality. And all along, wherever I have touched upon one criminal act committed by one, I have shown you how it bore upon another and another, and how it bore upon all, and redounded to the great good and great benefit of all. So that when you refer to what I have said you will see that although I have not mentioned conspiracy, nor dealt, by that name, with any of the legal doctrines of conspiracy, yet I have all the time been introducing you to conspirators. And now before I proceed to take up Rerdell and his master, and go over what remains of the case, I deem it proper to make to you some explanation upon the subject of the law of conspiracy.

And, first, I desire to say to you, gentlemen, what conspiracy is not. Every combination is not a conspiracy, of course. It is proper that I should say to you, in the beginning, what is not needed to form a conspiracy. You may have supposed that in order to form a conspiracy it is necessary that the alleged conspirators should get together around table and mutually agree upon the acts to be done by each and the ultimate result to be accomplished by the general combination. That is not necessary. There need not be a word uttered by the mouth; there need not be a word in writing. A conspiracy in law means this: The concurrence of mind to accomplish a given result by various means, each looking to the accomplishment of that result. The conspirators need never know each other, need never see each other. They may conspire across mountains, across rivers, across continents, across oceans if they all understand that a certain object is to be accomplished, and each is to do his part in aid of that object as time and occasion may arise.

The COURT. It must be a common object.

Mr. MERRICK. I think I said a common object; if I did not, I dropped the word. Each must understand the object, and it must be the common object to be accomplished by the parties.

The COURT. That is, there must be a unity of purpose. Many persons may be engaged in pursuing a common object, apparently similar in each case, without being engaged in a conspiracy. For instance, if this story of Walsh's be true as to what Brady told him, it was Brady's custom to exact 30 per cent. of all expeditions he ordered. Every contractor who obtained expedition paid him that 30 per cent., if that evidence is true. But the fact that they all paid him the 30 per cent., does not make out a conspiracy between those who paid the 30 per cent. because they were individuals, each acting for himself. So that, in addition to that, similarity of conduct on the part of different persons and similarity of interests may exist without there being a conspiracy. There must be, besides a general similarity of conduct, the bond of the common understanding, if not a common interest, in the parties engaged in a conspiracy for the purpose of reaching one object common to them all. I think so. I do not know, Mr. Merrick, that your remarks needed that correction.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not think, sir, that I expressed any opinion different from the intimation of the court.

The COURT. I wanted the jury to get a clear comprehension of the difference between individual acts of a similar character but of an individual nature, and the same acts united by a common purpose on the part of those engaged in the prosecution of the object.

Mr. MERRICK. If Brady gave these orders upon these false affidavits, understanding that he was to receive so much for giving them on behalf of these contractors, and these contractors understood that he was to give the orders in consideration of receiving so much, that constituted a conspiracy.

I desire to disabuse your minds of the idea that I feared might have arisen that there would be some necessity for a formal execution of articles of copartnership in order to create conspiracy. That is what I wanted to do during the few minutes that remain of this session of the court. And I will read, as an illustration of what I think about the matter, and as part of my argument, from a very good authority upon the subject, namely, 3 Dillon, 585, where in the Whisky cases, the United States circuit judge pronounced the following opinion :

It is not necessary to constitute a conspiracy that two or more persons should meet together and enter into an explicit or formal agreement for an unlawful scheme, or that they should directly, by words or in writing, state what the unlawful scheme was to be, and the details of the plan or means by which the unlawful combination was to be made effective. It is sufficient if two or more persons, in any manner, or through any contrivance, positively or tacitly come to a mutual understanding to accomplish a common and unlawful design. In other words, where an unlawful end is sought to be effected, and two or more persons, actuated by the common purpose of accomplishing that end, work together, in any way, in furtherance of the unlawful scheme, every one of said persons becomes a member of the conspiracy, although the part he was to take therein was a subordinate one, or was to be executed at a remote distance from the other conspirators. A combination formed by two or more persons to effect an unlawful end is a conspiracy, said persons acting under a common purpose to accomplish the end designed. Any one who, after a conspiracy is formed, and who knows of its existence, joins therein, becomes as much a party thereto from that time as if he had originally conspired.

This last clause is applicable to Vaile. Now, gentlemen, if you can bear this exposition of the law in mind, you will understand what is meant by a conspiracy. Brady to make the orders, one to get up the petitions, one to prepare the affidavits, to swear to them in blank, another to fill them in, each one doing some act which is the co-ordinate of an act done by another, and all which acts, with their respective co-ordinates, moving in the common direction of defrauding the United States. If you see in the individual acts, in the workings of the parties, such harmony of movement, such uniformity of co-ordination, that you are constrained to believe that they were designed, you have the conspiracy established. The ultimate design you will find is worked out; and by reasoning from the fact that the different transactions could not have occurred relatively to each other in the way they did, unless design presided over the whole, you will be constrained to the conclusion that a common purpose must have existed among the actors. For instance, you take your watch, Mr. Foreman. Open it and look at it. What do you find? You find an "infinite" variety of wheels, each working in harmony and in perfect accord with every other. You find a main-spring, large wheels and small wheels, all working together, moving in the interior; for what? Not for their individual entertainment, or for a result to be accomplished by any individual or separate wheel; but each wheel locking in some other wheel, and all moving together to accomplish, in the union and harmony of their united movement, the simple purpose of making the hands follow the course of the sun in his circuit around the world. Each wheel may be likened to one of these parties, acting in harmony with the others, each performing some separate and distinct function, but every function acting in harmony with every other, and all those actions necessarily united to the consummation of the ultimate grand purpose—the robbery of the Treasury of the United States.

The hour of adjournment has arrived, may it please your honor.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

T U E S D A Y, J U N E 5, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

The COURT. I do not often take up the reports as printed in the morning, but I see in the report of some remarks made by the court yesterday, at page 5631, this sentence:

For instance, if this story of Walsh's be true as to what Brady told him, it was Brady's custom to exact 30 per cent. of all expeditions he ordered. Every contractor who obtained expedition paid him that 30 per cent., if that evidence is true.

I think it was 20 per cent.

Mr. MERRICK. It was 20.

The COURT. According to Walsh's statement Brady told him that it was his custom to levy 20 per cent. per annum upon the gross amount of all expeditions. The reporter made a mistake, or if he did not, I made a mistake. I do not think I could have made the mistake, because, although I have not looked at Walsh's statement since, I know he said 20 per cent., and not 30.

Mr. MERRICK. Shall I proceed, your honor?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] In reference to the correction which his honor has just made in the report of yesterday's proceedings, I may say to you, gentlemen, that this testimony of Walsh was designed in its introduction to have, and has this bearing on the case; not that these defendants obeyed and conformed to this custom of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General as stated by Walsh, but that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General declared that it was the habit of his office to receive personal remuneration for the exercise of his official functions in that respect. I have no doubt that he made different arrangements with different parties, and with different combinations. In your consideration of the testimony of Walsh you will inevitably be led to this conclusion: First, that the habit and the disposition existed of charging compensation for official acts. Second, that if these parties defendant in this case, except Brady, were combined and united for the purpose of obtaining emolument and fortune by means of Brady's orders, they had with Brady an arrangement of some percentage which necessarily brought Brady into the combination they had formed and made him a coconspirator with them; not that it was necessarily 20 per cent., but that he carried out his custom of receiving emolument under the operation of some understanding with them.

In further explanation of the general principle of the doctrine of conspiracy which I have been discussing, I shall read to the jury as part of my argument the opinion of one of the great men of the past who has adorned in his judicial station the highest magistracy of the country. In the case of the United States against Lyman Cole et al., reported in 5 McLean's Reports, the late Mr. Justice McLean, speaking of conspiracy, uses the following language, at page 601 :

The indictment in this case is found under the twenty-third section of the act of the 3d of March, 1825. It provides: "That if any person or persons shall on the high seas or within the United States, willfully and corruptly conspire, combine, and confederate with any person or persons, such other person or persons being either within or without the United States, to cast away, burn, or otherwise destroy any ship or vessel, or procure the same to be done, with intent to injure any person or body politic, that hath underwritten or shall thereafterward underwrite, any policy of insurance thereon, or of goods on board thereof, or with intent to injure any person or body politic, that hath lent or advanced, or thereafter shall lend or advance, any money on such vessel, on bottomry or respondentia, or shall within the United States build or fit out, or aid in building or fitting out any ship or vessel, with intent that the same shall be cast away, burnt, or destroyed, for the purpose or with the design aforesaid, every person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of felony, and shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor not exceeding ten years.

The offense there prohibited by the statute was a conspiracy to cast away or burn a vessel on the high seas with a view to injuring any person or corporation. It seems that the defendants had procured insurance upon fraudulent invoices. Professing to have loaded the ship, they went to insurance companies and obtained insurance, not upon what was really in the vessel, but upon false invoices falsely representing what was in the vessel. The question was whether there was a conspiracy among them to cast away or burn this vessel. I may remark in the first instance, before reading what Justice McLean says upon certain points, that I desire to call the fact to your attention that he states that the burning of the vessel, the ultimate object of the conspiracy, was not at all necessary to consummate the crime of conspiracy, although if they had burned the vessel or caused it to be burned it would have been strong, if not conclusive, proof of the conspiracy. You will perceive, as I read to you from what Justice McLean says, the remarkable analogy between that case and the case now before you. The ultimate object of the conspiracy, as charged in this indictment, was to defraud the United States. The object of the conspiracy in the case of Cole was to burn the vessel. The means by which they were to accomplish the fraud and obtain the benefit they were to derive from the conspiracy were false affidavits and false petitions in the present case. The means by which they were to benefit and procure individual and pecuniary emolument in the case of Cole that I am now considering were by insurances obtained on false invoices. Our case: Orders of Brady obtained on false affidavits. That case: Insurances on stock obtained under false invoices. Let us see what Justice McLean says first in reference to the manner of proof of the conspiracy :

A conspiracy is rarely, if ever, proved by positive testimony. When a crime of high magnitude is about to be perpetrated by a combination of individuals, they do not act openly, but covertly and secretly. The purpose formed is known only to those who enter into it. Unless one of the original conspirators betray his companions and give evidence against them, their guilt can be proved only by circumstantial evidence. This kind of evidence often satisfies a jury of the guilt of the accused. But in such a case the circumstances must be so strong as to be inconsistent with the innocence of the accused. It is said by some writers on evidence that such circumstances are stronger than positive proof. A witness swearing positively, it is said, may misapprehend the facts or swear falsely, but that circumstances cannot lie.

The common design is the essence of the charge.

Now, listen to this, gentlemen, and lay it up in your memories :

This may be made to appear when the defendants steadily pursue the same object, whether acting separately or together, by common or different means, all leading to the same unlawful result. And where prima facie evidence has been given of a combination, the acts or confessions of one are evidence against all.

I will read a part of that again :

This may be made to appear when the defendants steadily pursue the same object, whether acting separately or together, by common or different means, all leading to the same unlawful result.

Whether some of the parties act by procuring petitions for expedition, some by forging the names of petitioners, as Miner did on the famous Hall petition, some by obtaining affidavits, some by inclosing affidavits and petitions to the département, some by importunities at the department, and some by making orders at the department of such enormity as to shock the understanding and belief of ordinary men, they are acting together to produce a common result. Then, further down, he says, in reference to the bills of lading or the invoices upon which the insurance was obtained, and he would have said the same with regard to the affidavits upon which the orders in this case were obtained :

So if it appears that the bills of lading were false, it shows a combination to injure the underwriters.

So if it appears that the affidavits were false it shows a combination to injure the United States. So, if the affidavits were forged, if they were blank when written, and subsequently filled up in a manner inconsistent with the truth they show a common design to obtain a fraudulent order from Brady to injure the United States.

Again, on page 610, he says :

If these insurances were made on false invoices or bills of lading it would afford conclusive evidence that the intention was to injure the underwriters, and it would authorize a presumption against the defendants, that they had done anything necessary to be done to effectuate their object. And if the insurance was greatly beyond the probable value of the article shipped, at the place of consignment, it would be ground on which the fairness of the transaction might well be questioned.

Just exactly as when we had reached a period in the case at which we deemed it expedient to ask that the declarations of one of these conspirators should be introduced against the others, his honor then said that the extraordinary character of these orders impressed him most unfavorably in reference to their good faith.

Now, to paraphrase the sentence that I have read to you and apply it to the present case : If these orders were obtained on false affidavits it would afford conclusive evidence that the intention was to injure the United States, and it would authorize a presumption against the defendants that they had done anything necessary to be done to effectuate their object if the orders granted were beyond the proper value of the services rendered, and specially in the teeth of the law providing for the estimate of that value it would be ground on which the fairness of the transaction might well be questioned.

I will now read you another passage, gentlemen, as part of my argument. I adopt the expressions of these learned men for the reason that they condense better than I can and speak with more explicitness than I can, as well as for the further reason that I am sure, like yourselves, I am severely oppressed by this atmosphere and my mind works with some pain to my body and possibly not with satisfaction to you. I read from 2 Wharton's Criminal Law, 8th edition, which is the last edition, the opinion pronounced by Judge King in a conspiracy case, and found in a note to section 1398 :

In prosecution for criminal conspiracy, says Judge King, the proof of the combination charged must always be extracted from the circumstances connected with the transactions which form the subject of the accusation. In the history of criminal administration the case is rarely found in which direct and positive evidence of criminal combination exists. To hold that nothing short of such proof is sufficient to establish a conspiracy, would be to give immunity to one of the most dangerous crimes which infest society.

I may add to that expression of Judge King which was intended to apply to an ordinary conspiracy formed in society for the consummation of a criminal purpose, that the crime of conspiracy to defraud the United States, in which crime one of the civil functionaries of the United States is involved, one of those functionaries who was placed by the supreme authority to guard the interests of the people, becomes a crime much more, yea, infinitely more dangerous than any conspiracy involving simply private individuals, in reference to private transactions in social and business life. The judge continues:

Hence, in order to discover conspirators we are forced to follow them through all the devious windings in which the natural anxiety of avoiding detection teaches men so circumstanced to envelope themselves and to trace their movements from the slight, but often unerring, marks of progress which the most adroit cunning cannot so effectually obliterate as to render them unappreciable to the eye of the sagacious investigator.

This passage, gentlemen of the jury, from Mr. Justice King's opinion last read, is especially applicable to the devious ways and methods of Stephen W. Dorsey, adopted for the purpose of concealing his connection with this transaction during the period that he was in the United States Senate; but he has left slight traces by which you may track him with as unerring certainty as you could thread the mazes of the labyrinth if you had the clue of Ariadne to guide you:

It is from the circumstances attending a criminal or a series of criminal acts that we are able to become satisfied that they have been the results not merely of individual, but the products of concerted and associated action, which, if considered separately, might seem to proceed exclusively from the immediate agents to them; but which may be so linked together by circumstances, in themselves slight, as to leave the mind fully satisfied that these apparently isolated acts are truly parts of a common whole.

Now, in reference to the affidavits filed in this case, gentlemen, I have as to one affidavit introduced four of these several defendants as participants in its manipulation. It is not necessary for us in considering the affidavits to regard them, and we cannot regard them as made severally by one or by another. We find affidavits written in blank by one member of the conspiracy, filled in by another member of the conspiracy, sworn to by a third member of the conspiracy, and carried to the department by a fourth member of the conspiracy, and there, according to the circumstantial evidence in the case, possibly manipulated by Brady himself, or being there considered and thought over and discarded and another affidavit, still preserving the proportions, ordered to be filed by him, as was the case in the matter of the affidavits on the Pueblo and Rosita route. You will recall the evidence as to those affidavits without my repeating it, and you will recall the proof that as to the first affidavit filled in by Rerdell leave was asked to withdraw it, two days after it was filed and a second affidavit then placed on record, and yet the two affidavits differed in nothing as to results. The proportions being preserved the results became the same. They differed in nothing except that the second affidavit made an apparently better record for Brady and was surer to protect him from peril when investigation should turn over the pages that he had blotted with his iniquity.

The COURT. For the sake of reference, Mr. Merrick, I should be obliged to you if you would name the first affidavit in the preparation of which you claim that four were concerned.

Mr. MERRICK. That is the first or second affidavit, I think, of the 21st of April which Dorsey swore to, your honor.

The COURT. The first of the Addison County affidavits?

Mr. MERRICK. I think it is the first of the Addison County affidavits, your honor. I will look and tell your honor the next time I come into court precisely what it is. There is another affidavit in which the word "twelve" was inserted by Rerdell, after it was filed in the department. If Colonel Bliss will take them and look at them he will probably find the one the report refers to. I did not bring down the papers I have already used and therefore have not the specific reference.

The adequacy of the evidence in prosecutions for a criminal conspiracy to prove the existence of such a conspiracy, like other questions of the weight of evidence, is a question for the jury.

Bear in mind, gentlemen, as part of the law claimed by me, what I read from Justice King. I believe the court will instruct you that such is the law, and I shall ask the court to instruct you also in this case as follows, laying these propositions down as correct law:

In considering the acts of the various defendants the jury will bear in mind:

1st. That forgery is a crime under the law.

The COURT. Is this forgery?

Mr. MERRICK. I question if it is. If a blank affidavit is subsequently filled up I call it forgery.

The COURT. You call it forgery.

Mr. MERRICK. I call it forgery. I think it is forgery for Miner to write the name of another man on a petition.

The COURT. You might find some difficulty in maintaining that proposition. Certainly it is wrong to do as he is claimed to have done. But I speak of technical forgery.

Mr. MERRICK. I understand.

1st. That forgery is a crime under the law.

I may add to that the qualification suggested by the judge, that if it is not a crime under the law it is a high moral offense.

The COURT. It is certainly a fraud.

Mr. MERRICK. It is certainly a fraud. I will qualify this prayer as I go along:

2n. That to alter in any particular, after it has been signed, a paper required or authorized by law to be executed is a forgery.

3d. That to file any such forged paper in a department of the Government to obtain its action thereon is a crime.

4th. That a false oath or affidavit filed in a department of the Government is criminal under the statutes of the United States, and punishable like forgery.

5th. That the filing of a false, fraudulent, altered, or forged paper in any department of the Government with the design and intention thereby to deceive any executive officer of the Government with reference to a matter subject to his jurisdiction, for the benefit of the person filing the paper or causing it to be filed, is a crime under the statute law of the United States.

6th. That the presentation of any claim to an executive department of the Government for payment when said claim is fraudulent, and so known to be by the person presenting the same, is a crime against the United States.

7th. That the presentation for payment to any department of the Government of a claim against the United States founded upon fraud, or upon a contract obtained by fraud, is a crime if the person presenting the same or causing it to be presented is cognizant of the fraud.

Those instructions are asked that the various acts of these parties may be brought before you in their criminal and offensive character or in their fraudulent character in a condensed form, in order that you may reason as to why these men should have been guilty of these criminal acts, and come to the conclusion, appreciating the ordinary motives governing human nature, that a man does not do a criminal act without an ultimate purpose of some particular benefit to himself. When you find a set of men doing a series of co-ordinate criminal acts all tending to the consummation of one purpose, namely, personal emolument by defrauding the Treasury of the United States, you are forced, as sensible men, to the conclusion that the individuals who perpetrated these co-ordinate acts were in a conspiracy to dovetail the co-ordinate and criminal acts into each other so that by their common operation they should produce the result designed by all, namely, the obtaining of personal emolument by defrauding the Government. I will read to you, gentlemen, a passage from the opinion of one of the greatest men that ever adorned this country. William L. Marcy delivered the opinion from which I will read. It is the case of The People vs. Mather, reported in 4 Wendell, 230, and is the famous case arising out of circumstances which you will recollect, namely, the extraordinary disappearance of Morgan, the Mason, in New York. In the marginal note it is stated as follows :

The fact of conspiring need not be proved. If parties concur in doing the act, although they were not previously acquainted with each other, it is a conspiracy.

They need not be friends ; they need not be acquaintances. But if they co-operate in doing two acts, neither one of which would have been effectual without the other, and if both are operative to produce the result, that is a conspiracy, though between strangers. At page 261, he says :

The law considers that whenever they act they renew, or, perhaps, to speak more properly, they continue their agreement, and this agreement is renewed or continued as to all whenever any one of them does an act in furtherance of their common design. In this respect conspiracy resembles treason in England when directed against the life of the king. The crime consists in imagining the death of the king. In contemplation of law the crime is committed wherever the traitor is, and furnishes proof of his wicked intention by the exhibition of any overt act.

That passage is particularly applicable to that part of the case which I will consider as belonging to a period subsequent to April 1, 1879, when these men met together, and, as the counsel on the other side said, met for the purpose of agreeing to separate. I will show you that this meeting was not for the purpose of agreeing to separate from the crime of conspiracy, but was an agreement to separate the plunder which the conspiracy had achieved, each party binding himself, by an agreement at that time, to co-operate with every other party in enhancing the value of the plunder severally set off to each, and to carry out the original purpose of the conspiracy, to defraud the United States, by furnishing any papers between themselves that might be needed for the purpose of carrying out that conspiracy. And I will show you, when I reach that part of the case, that after they had thus divided the routes Miner furnished the affidavits upon the routes that passed to Dorsey, and with which Miner claims to have nothing to do, and that affidavits and papers were flying back and forth between the distributors, and that the only result of that agreement of April 1, 1879, was to divide the plunder, but to keep the crime ; to divide the burglars' tools, but agree to help the burglary ; and that after that the burglary went on just as regularly, just as energetically, and just as criminally as it had gone on before by the co-operative action of these parties exchanging, under their contract, the mutualities of assistance.

Mr. BLISS. The affidavit to which Mr. Merrick refers as bringing four of the conspirators together is 6 E, on the route from Trinidad to Madison, signed by John W. Dorsey, filed by S. W. Dorsey, altered in the Post-Office Department by Rerdell, and, as Mr. Merrick argued, with the knowledge of Mr. Brady.

The COURT. What is the date of that?

Mr. BLISS. The affidavit is dated 26th April, 1879, filed 30th of April, 1879; and Mr. Rerdell swore that he altered it at some time in May, 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, also, may it please your honor, the affidavit of the 21st or 26th, 25 S——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] What do you claim about that affidavit?

Mr. MERRICK. Different persons combined in the transaction.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Four persons.

Mr. MERRICK. Four persons in the affidavit on the route from Trinidad to Madison.

Mr. BLISS. That is 6 E.

Mr. MERRICK. Three persons were combined in nearly all the rest.

One other author I beg leave to read from as part of my argument in this case, gentlemen, to develop the theory which I have been presenting to you. I refer to Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, where you will find a very distinct and clear exposition of this doctrine of conspiracy and an illustration of its application, at page 416:

A husband, his wife, and their servants were indicted for a conspiracy to ruin a card-maker, and it appeared that each had given money to the apprentices of the prosecutor to put grease into the paste, which spoiled the cards, but no evidence was given of more than one of the defendants being present at the same time.

Each of the three did the act, but there was only one present at the same time.

It was objected that this was not a conspiracy, there being no evidence of communication; but Pratt, chief-justice, ruled that the defendants being all of one family and concerned in making cards, this was evidence of a conspiracy to go to a jury.

Now, gentlemen, I will pass from that point, taking occasion possibly hereafter to recur to it.

I now come to consider, with a little more particularity, the character and effect of the agreement of April 1, 1879. I do not know, gentlemen, that I can pass with greater ease from the point I have been considering to any other more directly illustrative of the practical application of the doctrine of conspiracy in this case than by referring you to the circumstances under which Mr. Vaile came into this combination. It is contended on the other side that Mr. Vaile is perfectly innocent. Let me call your attention to one or two prominent facts that characterize his introduction into the conspiracy, premising by saying that where a conspiracy already exists any one who comes into that conspiracy becomes as much a part of it as one of the original organizers.

Before I do that let me make a suggestion, in reply to the view thrown out by Mr. Ingersoll, that it is necessary for the Government, in regard to this conspiracy, to show the four W's—when, where, who, what? It is immaterial to you, gentlemen, when this conspiracy was formed, subject to a limitation I will speak of directly. It is immaterial to you where it was formed. For what it is formed is material. Who formed it is material. So we will take one-half, which is a liberal allowance for the doctrine of the gentleman as correct. It is enough for you if you find that this conspiracy was in existence on the 20th day of May, 1879, for the reason that prior to that time acts done by a defendant are barred by the statute of limitations. But as to the period of its formation, that is entirely an immaterial question. It may have been formed one year before or ten years before. It is enough for you to know that it was in existence then, and, as the court will tell you, if you find it to have been in existence then, you have done all that you are required to do in reference to finding all about its formation and continuance. Of course it was formed, according to the theory of the prosecution, long anterior to the 20th of May, 1879, and, according to the theory of the prosecution, it continued from the period of its formation, whenever that may have been, down through the days and the nights and the years to the 20th day of May, 1879, and after the 20th day of May, 1879; and the tree which was planted by these defendants prior to that time continued to bear its fruit during the year of 1879 and down to the end of the continuance of these contracts. When I have satisfied you that it had been formed or had existed prior to the 1st of April, 1879, as you will see by and by, I have satisfied you of the most important fact that the prosecution need satisfy you of to demand from you a verdict against these defendants.

Now, what was its condition in 1878, when Vaile came in? And I will take it up at that point, taking up a segment of the time subsequent to its formation. It had then been formed. Now, how did Vaile make his appearance? Let us see. And I think you will conclude with me, gentlemen, that this is one of the most remarkable transactions that ever took place among men of business and men of sense, and is in itself not only proof that Vaile was a member of the conspiracy, but proof that there was a conspiracy at the time to receive membership. You recollect that Vaile tells you, gentlemen of the jury, that he was here for a while in the summer of 1878, when he saw this unfortunate creature, Miner, in a state of distress. His great heart was moved with philanthropic sympathy, and he helped him because he was a son of Adam. There had been no relations between them, no interchange of mutual kindnesses, no past associations to awaken kindly sympathy and kindly friendship; but he was sorrowing over these contracts, and Vaile pitied his distress and came to his relief. He embraced him as a long-lost brother, and I can almost fancy that I see the two—realizing the description given by a humorist of the present day—going together hand in hand upon their first meeting to shed fraternal tears over the grave of their father Adam, for their common descent from him was the only tie that bound them together. [Laughter.]

Now, there was some communication between Miner and Vaile at that time in reference to Vaile coming into the concern, but nothing was consummated, nothing was done, except some doubtful agreements that do not remain of record, but rest only in Miner's extremely treacherous memory. Vaile went to the West. Still nothing was done. Vaile receives a telegram from Thomas J. Brady, dated August 20 or 21, 1878, asking him, "Which of the routes of Peck, Dorsey, Miner, and Watts will you put service on?" Vaile replies, "I will put service on the routes of Peck, Dorsey, and Miner—not Watts." Why did he leave out Watts? Why did this large-hearted man, whose soul was so big that it took in all the world, exclude Watts? Why did he not take him in too? Miner was the acquaintance of a day. John W. Dorsey he had never seen. Peck he never did see in his whole life. There were two strangers, and one other who was the acquaintance of a day. He answers, "I will put service on the routes." He then goes to work and expends his money, and not until some time in September or October—what was the date of the contract, Colonel Bliss?

Mr. BLISS. The 16th of August, executed in October.

Mr. MERRICK. Not until some time late in October was a contract executed between Vaile and these parties. Up to the time of the signing of the contract in October, which was antedated to the 16th day of August, there was no contract binding upon these parties.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, I think I can best present the case to you by reading the testimony of Mr. Vaile himself. I will read a part of it and occasionally comment, in order to enlighten you and will apply it as I go along; and I think when you have heard it read, you must inevitably come to the conclusion that Vaile had an understanding with Brady and an understanding with Miner, that these then unprofitable routes were to be made profitable by some process of manipulation which they do not disclose, and if I do not convince you of that, I am willing to abandon this case. On page 4044, this occurs, on Vaile's cross-examination:

Q. You say that this agreement of the 16th of August, 1878, was in point of fact not signed by you until some time in October, as you think?—A. That is my recollection of it.

Q. Where were you when you signed it?—A. I think in this city.

Q. When you signed it had it been signed by the other parties?—A. I could not say; I don't know whether it had or not. I thought it was signed by them first; but I find that there is one here signed by me and Mr. Miner—

Q. [Interposing.] At the time when you signed it, was Miner in the city?—A. I think he was. I think he was living here.

Now, I read from page 4045:

Q. Was Peck here?—A. I don't know; I never saw him.

Q. You never saw Peck?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was John W. Dorsey here?—A. I think not; I had never seen him at that time.

That is, when he signed this agreement.

Q. You had never seen him at that time?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. Do you remember when you first saw John W. Dorsey?—A. I think the last of November, but I won't be positive.

Q. In 1878?—A. 1878.

Q. Prior to the execution of that contract by you in October, who had been carrying on the business referred to in connection with these routes?—A. I think Mr. Miner, but I am not sure. I knew nothing about the business.

Prior to the time he signed that contract in October, dated back to the 16th of August, he swears to you that he knew nothing about that business. Not the business of mail carrying, for that had been the business of his life, but nothing about that business of Miner's. "I knew nothing about the business."

Q. Who had furnished the money necessary to carry on that business upon all the routes between the 16th of August and the time in October when you signed it?

Can you imagine what his answer was?

A. I think I did.

Q. You think you furnished the money upon all the routes?—A. Yes, sir; from the 16th of August up to the time I signed it.

The contract.

Q. Did you sign here in October?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You had not prior to that time made any agreement as to the terms at all?—A. None whatever.

From the 16th day of August down to October, when he signed the paper, he had made no agreement at all as to the terms; and yet, within that time, as I will show you ultimately out of his own mouth, he expended from $20,000 to $50,000.

The COURT. Did he not refer then to any period prior to August 16?

Mr. BLISS. No, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir.

The COURT. Read that again, and let me see.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

Q. Who had furnished the money necessary to carry on that business upon all the routes between the 16th of August and the time in October when you signed it?

The COURT. I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. MERRICK. [Continuing:]

A. I think I did.

That was not prior to August.

Q. You think you furnished the money upon all the routes?—A. Yes, sir; from the 16th of August up to the time I signed it.

Q. You had not prior to that time made any agreement as to the terms at all?—A. None whatever.

But here is the conclusive proof:

Q. Prior to the signing of the contract in October, when had you verbally agreed to its terms, if at all?—A. It must have been about the time that I signed it in October.

The COURT. Well, but Vaile testified pretty largely in regard to his interviews with Miner here in August. Prior to the 16th of August, he spoke of negotiations between them, and how they fell into each other's company.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; if your honor will excuse me; not prior to the 16th of August. All that occurred prior to the 16th of August was an arrangement about his taking up the contracts provided they were declared failing contractors. But there was nothing of detail.

Mr. MERRICK. Nothing of detail at all.

The COURT. I speak in reference to the formation of the acquaintance and the subsequent negotiations between Miner and Vaile.

Mr. MERRICK. That was this: Vaile, I believe, tried to get an extension of time for Miner to put on the service, and I think he got some extension.

Mr. HENKLE. To the 16th of August.

Mr. MERRICK. To the 16th of August, but he had no agreement with Miner as to the terms upon which he was to go on—none whatever. He was thinking of taking the routes if they were declared failing contractors, and had some arrangement to prevent their being declared failing contractors, possibly. But am I not right in saying that there was no agreement as to the terms?

Mr. HENKLE. No definite agreement.

Mr. MERRICK. That is what I said. Now, from the 16th of August until October there was no agreement as to the terms. So says his counsel. Now, gentlemen, bear with me through these interruptions.

Q. You had not, prior to that time, made any agreement as to the terms at all?—A. None whatever.

Q. There had been no agreement as to how the percentages of profits were to be distributed?—A. Not at all.

Q. And you had gone on paying all the expenses?—A. I had.

Q. During that period were there profits, or were the expenses in excess of the profits?—A. Oh, largely in excess of the profits.

During that period, from the 16th of August to the signing of the contract, the expenses were largely in excess of the profits, and he had gone on paying them all.

I now read from page 4046:

Q. You went on paying the expenses of putting in operation those contracts?—A. I did.

Q. Those contracts were in the names of Peck, Miner, and John W. Dorsey, were they not?—A. They were.

Q. You had never then seen Peck or Dorsey, had you?—A. Neither, that I recollect.

Q. And you had only the casual acquaintance with Miner which you gathered here in the preceding July?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And yet, without any arrangement with any one of them, with no means provided by which you could get even the money paid by the Government for performing the service, you went on incurring these expenses, did you?—A. I did.

Q. Had you any arrangement or agreement by which you were to be reimbursed the money which you were paying out?—A. I did not have at that time.

Now, sir, here was this man, a mail-contractor all his life, belonging to a class of men noted for their astuteness, a man of business, as I have shown you, who, by his business capacity, had accumulated a large fortune, as shown by the record, in view of the bonds upon which he became security for nearly a million dollars, paying out money upon losing contracts without any agreement or any assurance that he should ever be paid back one cent.

Mr. HENKLE. Mr. Merrick, as you are making the closing argument, and do not wish to be unfair—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I do not, most unquestionably.

Mr. HENKLE. You have not stated all that Mr. Vaile said in that connection.

Mr. MERRICK. Read it, then.

Mr. HENKLE. On page 4045:

Q. Under what arrangement and with whom had you gone on paying the expenses of all these routes which were held by other persons?—A. From the moment that I telegraphed General Brady that I would see the Miner, Peck, and Dorsey routes started I considered myself in the light of the contractor.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; that is right.

The COURT. That was the 20th of September.

Mr. MERRICK. Twentieth of August. "From the moment I received Brady's telegram I considered myself in the light of the contractor." Good! Why? How?

Mr. HENKLE. The moment he telegraphed Brady that he would put this on.

Mr. MERRICK. That moment he considered himself in the light of the contractor. Why? By arrangement with whom? By arrangement with what contractor? By agreement with what contractor? None. But when Brady telegraphed him to put it on, and he wrote, "I will put it on," he considered that the consummation of the contract made by one co-conspirator in behalf of his other co-conspirators, the contractors. The truth will sometimes come out, even when it is tried to be concealed. There was no other reason by which he could consider himself in the light of the contractor. He could consider himself in the light of the contractor in no other way on the face of this earth except by some bargain with a contractor, and when Brady telegraphed to him to put on service he replies, "I will put service on the contracts of Miner, Peck, and Dorsey," and he then says, "I then considered myself in the light of the contractor, because I knew that Brady would protect me. I knew that Brady had the right to make this arrangement, and I considered that the arrangement under which I was to operate." I tell you, gentlemen, as Mr. Ingersoll says, a lie won't fit anywhere, but the truth does fit. It is a strange thing to see in the moral economy of this world, how, when two lies are put together, you can never fill up the crevices, but how, when two truths are put together, the ragged edges of the one dovetail into the excavations of the other until they become a solid. No; a lie will not fit anything. But every truth fits every other truth. Truth is harmonious, truth is fraternal, truth is sympathetic, truth unites with truth. But each lie reveals and exposes every other lie.

Now, you will find the truth developed even by the interruption of Vaile's own counsel, that Mr. Vaile came into this combination with an understanding of its nature, and with an appreciation of the ultimate growth and development of fortune. He came into it knowing what was to be done, and met these expenses without obligation for repayment and without security, because he could rely upon the head actor in the conspiracy, namely, Thomas J. Brady. I thank the gentleman for his interruption.

Q. How much money had you paid out prior to the date in October when you signed this agreement?—A. I could not tell you; I paid out a good deal.

Q. How much—$5,000 or $50,000?—A. I had sent men to Oregon, and I don't recollect—

Q. [Interposing.] How much had you paid?—A. I can't tell

Q. You can tell whether it was $5,000?—A. It was more than $5,000.

Q. Was it $20,000?—A. It probably was.

Q. Was it not more than $40,000?—A. I think not at that time, but—

Q. [Interposing.] Had you not, in addition to the amount of money you had actually paid out, incurred other expenses which carried the amount up to at least $50,000, and had you not so stated?—A. If not before that, I did soon after.

Q. I mean at that time—before this contract was signed?—A. I can't say as to that, but I know that about the 1st of November there was $60,000 to $80,000, and I don't know but more than that.

Q. The 1st of November it was $60,000 to $80,000?—A. I think up to $100,000.

Q. Actually expended?—A. Yes; I think as much as that expended; I am not positive now.

Q. But you cannot tell whether the amount that had actually been expended when you signed this contract in October was as much as $50,000 or not?—A. No; I cannot.

Q. Will you say it was not?—A. No; I won't say that.

He says it was over $20,000, and he will not say that it was not $50,000; we may therefore conclude that it was certainly between $20,000 and $50,000, if not $50,000. And I repeat here that you must bear in mind now that not only between $20,000 and $50,000 advanced upon these routes was advanced by this enterprising mail carrier, a millionaire, without bargain, without agreement as to its being paid back, but without security and without a right in the property.

Mr. INGERSOLL. As to there being no security, of course you want to be correct?

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly, I do.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think the record shows that for the quarter ending September 30 the money was paid to Mr. Vaile.

Mr. MERRICK. I did not say that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That, I suppose, is security to that amount.

Mr. MERRICK. By an agreement made in October?

Mr. INGERSOLL. By an agreement made in August, not definitely fixed, and signed in October.

Mr. MERRICK. No.

Mr. INGERSOLL. In the mean time he drew all the money for the quarter ending September 30.

Mr. MERRICK. No. Now, find me the evidence, and I will read it, for I desire to be fair in this case, even beyond ordinary fairness.

Mr. HENKLE. The contract of these contractors with Mr. Vaile was that he should draw all the money. That contract was made on the 16th of August, and was sent out, as the testimony shows—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] No, sir; he says himself that he had no contract up to the time he signed this paper. The contract was signed here.

Mr. HENKLE. The testimony of Miner shows that the contract was sent out for Mr. Peck's signature and Mr. Dorsey's signature.

Mr. MERRICK. Why, Mr. Vaile says—I have just read it—that he had no agreement, either verbal or written, up to the time he signed this paper.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will call your attention—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] As to the payments, I think he did draw the pay; that I do not question. I have no doubt, gentlemen of the jury, that Brady saw that he got paid.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it not be right to see that he got paid if he performed the service?

Mr. MERRICK. I do not know about that. Brady's duty was to obey the law, and he could not, without declaring those contracts failing contracts and giving them to another, pay some individual for helping those contractors without being in combination with those contractors.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I simply want to call your attention to the fact that the pay on every one of these routes was given to Mr. Vaile.

The COURT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MERRICK. He arrived here on the 29th of September and got postal drafts for that quarter. But I am speaking of his testimony, and I am trying to deal with it as fairly as I know how. I do not want to put a shade upon a word or give a wrong emphasis to a word. I am reading just exactly what he says himself. Now I will go on, at page 4047:

Q. Did you know which routes were in the name of Peck, which in the name of Miner, and which were in the name of Dorsey?—A. I can't say that I did.

He did not even know what routes they had.

The COURT. What time is it that he refers to?

Mr. BLISS. The time he telegraphed to Mr. Brady, on the 22d or 23d of August.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He does not say that he does not know what routes they had, but what each one had.

Mr. MERRICK. I will accept that, too. He says he does not know which routes were in the name of Peck, which in the name of Miner, and which were in the name of Dorsey.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, that is right.

Mr. MERRICK. I will accept that:

Q. Did you know anything of John Dorsey or his responsibility?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you know anything of Peck or his responsibility?—A. I did not.

Q. You knew that Miner was a man without responsibility, I gather from your testimony?—A. I did.

Now, pause here. What was his condition then? He did not know anything about Dorsey's responsibility, he did not know anything about Peck's responsibility, but he knew that Miner was irresponsible financially:

Q. You assumed that liability—

That is, for these expenses—

simply from the sympathy that Mr. Miner had excited in your breast, you stated on your direct examination?—A. Yes.

Simply from sympathy for Miner :

Q. Having that sympathy for Miner, did you know at what price he had bid on any route?—A. I think I had looked at some routes before I had left here, but I could not tell what the prices were.

He did not know anything about it :

Q. Did you know what the aggregate amount of the contract prices of the contracts awarded to any one of those four parties was?—A. I did not.

He was as innocent as a child unborn :

Q. Did you know how many routes any one of them had?—A. No ; I don't think I did.

Q. Did you know the location of the routes?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you know the length of the routes?—A. I did not ; I don't think I did.

* * * * *

Q. Did you not at that time believe that the contracts had been taken at too low a price?—A. I did, so far as my observation had gone, and so far as my examination had gone.

Now, he knew nothing about it ; did not know the length of the routes ; did not know the location of the routes, knew nothing about to whom they respectively belonged. All that he did know was that they had been taken at too low a price, according to his observation ; in other words, they were taken at a price at which they were not considered to be profitable.

Q. That showed that they would be losing contracts?—A. Some of them.

Q. I mean in the aggregate.—A. Yes, sir.

Losing contracts in the aggregate, incapable, as I have shown you before, of being converted into gaining contracts, Vaile takes these contracts upon his shoulder and he carries this burden at Brady's suggestion made to him by telegraph in August ; has no contract upon the subject with the contractors giving him any rights in the premises until in the following October ; and, before he has a contract in the following October, expends between $20,000 and, $50,000—he cannot say that it was not $50,000—without any agreement to be paid back, without any security for its payment, with nothing to rest upon whatever except the fact that Brady had telegraphed him and he had agreed to put service on the routes ; and these routes, too, taken by contractors, as to the responsibility of two of whom (Peck and Dorsey) he knew nothing, and the third of whom (Miner) he knew to be irresponsible.

Gentlemen, can you believe that to have been simply an honest business transaction upon the part of a man whose intellect had been sharpened by keen contact with the bright workers of the far West, whose genius had been enlivened by the necessities of quick and acute action in the mail-contracting business throughout the country, and who, by the genius for making and saving, and, in making and saving, protecting his money, had made an immense fortune? Do you believe that such a man would have made such an arrangement as that? Is it within the range of human credulity that any man would have done so? I know no Yankee would have done it, but can any spendthrift District-of-Columbia man, or Maryland spendthrift, or reckless Southern man, give it credit for an instant?

When Vaile went on, and met these large expenditures, opened the iron chest where lay the accumulated sweat of his brow during years of toil, he understood from Brady that those then losing routes would loom up, under the magic of the touch of Brady's official power, tinged with the fraud of the false affidavits that were to be made, and become immensely profitable to him, as he says the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route did become.

We must reason about the condition of men according to what we know. If Vaile had been a simpleton, if Vaile had been a man that allowed his stage-drivers and carriers to rob him of his money, we might believe such a thing. But that would not have been this Vaile; that would have been another Vaile. That would have been a Vaile literally in the darkness and in the shadow. But this Vaile is a towering man, reaching his head above the mountains and catching the golden rays of the sun of enterprise and thrift, and converting them into ingots and putting them in his chest. This Vaile is a smart, delightful Vaile, not a Vaile of despondency.

Gentlemen, the large heart and extensive philanthropy of the man must commend him to your most charitable consideration. We must account for this man's conduct on some hypothesis consistent with what we know of ordinary human nature, and we have no evidence that a mail contractor's human nature is different from that of anybody else. I say that, in my judgment, he had not only arranged with Brady, but he had arranged with S. W. Dorsey. He quarreled with him afterwards; of course he did; quarreled with him in 1878, when they were both in the same conspiracy. Why? Two men like Stephen W. Dorsey and Vaile could no more work together in harmony in such a business than two women of decided character could keep house together, exercising common authority. [Laughter.] The cups and saucers would fly around every morning. Yes; they quarreled. Vaile came out of the West, as I will show you, like one of these Western tornadoes, full of wrath, in the latter part of February or 1st of March, 1879, determined to sweep Dorsey out of the concern, determined he would not keep house with him any longer, while Dorsey stood back ready to meet Vaile in the encounter and thrust him out. Why, gentlemen of the jury, if this large-hearted, money-making man, Mr. Vaile, had been seated among the money-changers in the temple when the Savior came to thrash them out and cleanse the sacred place from their defilement, he would have passed Vaile by, suspended the lash, laid his hand upon his head and blessed him, and his large charity and philanthropy would probably have saved the condemnation of the thieves adjacent to him, and even protected the temple itself from the denunciation of being a den of thieves. A man of such charity, such large philanthropy, is incomprehensible; and above all is it incomprehensible that a man of such wealth should thus peril his substance without promise of repayment or of security. You or I might have done it, but the rich man loves his money. The more he gets the better he loves it. Each ingot he throws in the chest, as it rattles against the others, sings to him a song of delight and avarice becomes the god he worships. He perils nothing, saves all, and gets what he can. So much for Mr. Vaile.

The COURT. In regard to that telegram, Mr. Merrick, when Mr. Vaile left here, he had this proposition under consideration, but he did not decide, if I remember the testimony, whether to take the routes off Miner's hands or not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is right.

Mr. BLISS. I think there is no testimony going even to that extent.

The COURT. Yes, there is. Certainly, he testified that he went home with the matter under consideration. Brady did not know, according to his testimony, whether Vaile was going to assume the performance of the service upon the routes of those three men Miner, Peck, and John W. Dorsey. But, at his instance, Brady had postponed declaring the contracts forfeited until the 16th of August. He went home from here with a mind uncertain as to what he was going to do. On the 20th of August, if I remember rightly, Brady telegraphed him to know what he was going to do about it, whether he was going to assume the performance of the service or not. In reply to that telegram he answered that he would take the routes belonging to Peck, Dorsey, and Miner, but that he would not take the routes belonging to Joshua H. Watts.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not those of Watts.

Mr. MERRICK. Not those of Watts; that is it.

The COURT. That was about the 20th of August.

Mr. HENKLE. The testimony is that he left in the hands of Miner written proposals to take these routes himself in case they were going to be declared failing contractors.

The COURT. That is outside of the question that I am looking to now.

Mr. BLISS. If your honor will allow me, I think you stated it a little more strongly than the testimony will warrant.

The COURT. I spoke of the impression on my mind.

Mr. BLISS. Precisely. On page 4007:

Q. What passed between you and Mr. Brady, if anything, with regard to these contracts before you went into them?—A. About the 1st of August, or perhaps the very last days of July, Mr. Miner requested me—

Then there was an interruption; afterwards he says:

A. The last days of July, probably the very last, or the 1st day of August—I do not recollect now—I went to Mr. Brady in behalf of Mr. Miner to get an extension of the time to put on the service not then on up to the 16th of the month.

Q. What took place between you and Mr. Brady at that time?—A. I represented to him what Mr. Miner had represented to me, that they had men scattered over the country upon these routes, and they thought that if they could get a further extension to the 16th they would be able to go on with the contracts; and I remarked to him that if that was true I thought it would be wise in him to extend the time. In that view he consented to extend the time up to the 16th of August.

Q. Upon that point I want to ask you whether you made any offer to Mr. Brady to pay him money or give him anything valuable of any kind, or offered him any sort of consideration, for the indulgence you asked of him on behalf of Mr. Miner at that time?—A. I did not.

* * * * *

Q. When did you first determine to take an interest in these routes?—A. I think it must have been about the 20th or 21st of August, 1878, or thereabouts.

Q. Do you know whether or not the service had been put on on the Miner routes by the 16th of August?

Then he goes on and refers to the telegram of Brady. There was some discussion about its admissibility, and then the testimony came out that it was dated the 20th or 21st of August. He then states the answer which he sent in a day or two afterwards. Then he says, on direct examination, at page 4012:

Q. Will you tell us, Mr. Vaile, whether before you went home you had made any definite agreement with Mr. Miner or anybody else as to going into this arrangement?—A. I had not.

Q. How far had your negotiations with Miner progressed at that time?—A. I had agreed, in case that General Brady should declare these parties failing contractors on the routes not started, that I would file an offer in my own name to take them at the contract prices. I left such offers with him before I went home.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That shows exactly what the court said.

Mr. BLISS. [Continuing to read:]

Q. In case General Brady should declare them failing contractors you left written offers with Mr. Miner to file to take the contracts?—A. Yes, sir; at the contract prices.

Q. Was that on behalf of yourself, or for their benefit?—A. Myself.

Q. For yourself?—A. Yes, sir; it was on their behalf. I was not anxious to get into it; it was to keep them from failing, for that would have made me responsible the same as a contractor; I would then become the contractor instead of them.

Mr. MERRICK. Exactly.

Mr. BLISS. [Continuing to read:]

Q. What I want to get at just now, Mr. Vaile, is whether your agreement with Miner contemplated that, in the event of your offer being accepted and you taking it, you were to take it on their behalf, or on your own?—A. Well, I would have been responsible, of course. The object was to have them not fail. * There was no definite agreement at all, but the object was simply to keep the service from failing.

Q. You proposed to keep them from failing?—A. Yes, sir. If these had failed, necessarily the whole row would have tumbled sooner or later.

Q. Had you acquired at that time any additional information as to the condition in which these routes were?—A. No; I had not.

Q. I mean financial condition.—A. I had not at that time.

I think that is all there is of it. Mr. Miner testifies, your honor, that the agreement as to making an offer was a device by which they would get time, because if he came in and took up the contracts, then, as a new contractor, he would necessarily be given time to go on and arrange to perform the service.

The COURT. I think that is about what I recollected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, that bears out exactly what the court said.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not see that that differs from what I said much, if at all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is the court through?

The COURT. I am through.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to say one word.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understood you to say that Brady suggested to Vaile that he take up this service. Do you refer to anything contained in the evidence, except the telegram?

Mr. MERRICK. No; nothing except the evidence of the circumstances. I think on those your own mind will lead you to agree with me.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not think that was suggested. It was simply a question as to what service he would take up.

Mr. BLISS. "What service do you expect to put into operation?"

Mr. INGERSOLL. I don't think that is a suggestion.

Mr. MERRICK. I don't think the testimony read differs at all from what I have stated.

The COURT. Perhaps not.

Mr. MERRICK. In no way whatever. There was talk here and talk there, but out of it all comes this——

The COURT. [Interposing.] There were some facts that you overlooked; that is all.

Mr. MERRICK. It may have been because I regarded them as immaterial. The fact is this: That Vaile, when he advanced this money, did so without security.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He had security.

Mr. MERRICK. There was no security.

Mr. HENKLE. He took the contracts himself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He had subcontracts on file in the department.

The COURT. Under these circumstances, I think no executive officer would perform his duty if he would allow the man who had assumed and taken the risk and put the service on to be cheated out of his pay.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is it.

Mr. BLISS. But if the contractors decline to sign subcontracts or postal drafts he could not prevent it.

The COURT. He could have managed it.

Mr. HENKLE. They do that all the time.

Mr. BLISS. The fact is, your honor, that it appears that on the 29th of September, Mr. Vaile came here, and having ascertained that there were on file post-office drafts given by Dorsey, as he testifies, he then got from Miner subcontracts under his power of attorney which on the 30th day of September he filed to get the pay then due.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That shows that he did want security.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, he did want security after he had spent the money. That was not the time to want it.

The COURT. He wanted to get the money.

Mr. MERRICK. He wanted to get the money which he had spent, and he was looking for it.

The COURT. He was right.

Mr. MERRICK. It was about that he and S. W. Dorsey finally quarreled. I want to state it right.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I know you do. Vaile left here in August. On the 20th of August he got the dispatch. He then assumed certain service. His first return to Washington was towards the last of September. The moment he returned he got his subcontracts.

Mr. HENKLE. And put them on file.

Mr. MERRICK. I will read you what he says. Let us see how he understands it:

Q. Had you any arrangement or agreement by which you were to be reimbursed the money which you were paying out?—A. I DID NOT HAVE AT THAT TIME.

The COURT. Well.

Mr. MERRICK. He had no agreement. He knows better than his counsel. He made that statement on the stand, and his counsel did not even argue in his case.

Mr. HENKLE. He had the contracts.

Mr. MERRICK. He had no contracts on the 15th of August. I am talking of one time and you are talking of another. The day he signed that contract he had no contract with the contractors.

Mr. HENKLE. He says that he considered himself the contractor.

Mr. MERRICK. "He considered himself!" Go home and dream that you are worth millions, and that will do as well as if you were. Consider yourself worth millions. It is just as good as if you were.

Q. Prior to the signing of the contract in October, when had you verbally agreed to its terms, if at all?—A. It must have been about the time that I signed it, in October.

He never had agreed to it verbally before at all. That is what he says. Now, I beg pardon, but we have had interruptions enough.

Mr. HENKLE. Now go on.

The COURT. Allow Mr. Merrick to go on.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; I beg pardon.

Mr. MERRICK. I want to be fair, but I can see nothing coming from these interruptions but useless confusion. Vaile's own counsel sits there and pretends that he thinks imagination of things equal to the reality.

Mr. HENKLE. Go on and have it your own way.

Mr. MERRICK. I am going to have it my own way, and I am going to have it Vaile's way. I am going to read what Vaile says. If you did not speak for Vaile, because you might cross somebody else's path, still Vaile spoke for himself. Now, gentlemen, be silent and hear Vaile.

Mr. HENKLE. I did not speak, because I did not think it was necessary.

Mr. MERRICK. Be silent and hear Vaile.

Mr. HENKLE. You have not made a shadow of a case against him, and I did not think it was necessary to speak in his defense.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, look here, Brother Henkle, you are a good member of the church. Argue your case on the evidence, but do not stretch your conscience by saying what you do not believe.

Mr. HENKLE. I do not stretch my conscience by speaking the truth.

Mr. MERRICK. No lawyer is required to hurt his conscience. Do not do that. Let Vaile speak for himself. I read from page 4045:

Q. You think you furnished the money upon all the routes?—A. Yes, sir; from the 16th of August up to the time I signed it.

Q. Prior to the signing of the contract in October, when had you verbally agreed to its terms, if at all?—A. It must have been about the time that I signed it, in October.

Q. Did you sign here in October?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You had not, prior to that time, made any agreement as to the terms at all?—A. None whatever.

Q. There had been no agreement as to how the percentages of profits were to be distributed?—A. Not at all.

Q. And you had gone on paying all the expenses?—A. I had.

Q. During that period were there profits, or were the expenses in excess of the profits?—A. Oh, largely in excess of the profits.

Q. Having gone on and done that during that period from the 16th of August, will you now tell me under what arrangement and with whom you had so done?—A. I made arrangements with Miner; this contract was drawn up for that.

Q. I mean the verbal arrangement preceding the contract, under which you went on and paid out the money for expenses during that period?—A. Perhaps I had better state—

Q. [Interposing.] Well, answer my question: Under what arrangement and with whom had you gone on paying the expenses of all these routes which were held by other persons?—A. From the moment that I telegraphed General Brady that I would see the Miner, Peck, and Dorsey routes started I considered myself in the light of the contractor.

Q. You had then from that time, which was somewhere about the 22d of August—General Brady having telegraphed you on the 20th, and you taking, you thought, two or three days to consider it—

A. [Interposing.] Yes.

Q. From that time on you considered yourself in the light of the contractor?—A. I did.

Q. You went on paying the expenses of putting in operation those contracts?—A. I did.

Q. Those contracts were in the names of Peck, Miner, and John W. Dorsey, were they not?—A. They were.

Q. You had never then seen Peck or Dorsey, had you?—A. Neither, that I recollect.

Q. And you had only the casual acquaintance with Miner which you gathered here in the preceding July?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And yet, without any arrangement with any one of them, with no means provided by which you could get even the money paid by the Government for performing the service, you went on incurring these expenses, did you?—A. I did.

Now, will you take his word or will you take his counsel's construction?

The COURT. Counsel do not deny that.

Mr. HENKLE. No, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

Q. Had you any arrangement or agreement by which you would be reimbursed?—

A. I DID NOT HAVE AT THAT TIME.

Then he goes on to tell how much money he paid out, and goes on to say he did not know where the routes were, how long they were, or anything about them, except according to his best judgment when he had looked over the papers, they were losing routes. The routes that he took were losing routes. -I submit that does not stand to reason that this business man should have taken those losing routes without having some assurance that he would be reimbursed his money. Suppose that he had a lien upon the amount of money paid by the Government. If they were losing routes they were losing routes because the expense of running consumed in payment to the carriers on the lines more than the Government paid to have them run, and the first lien on the amount to be paid by the Government was the carriers' lien. The carriers that ran the routes had to be paid first. If they were losing routes the amount that it cost to run them was greater than the amount the Government paid. If the carrier's lien, the first lien on the amount the Government paid, was greater than the contractors' pay there was nothing left wherewith to reimburse Vaile. Even if it had been the duty of the Second Assistant to see that Vaile was paid before the contractor was paid, Vaile could get nothing that the contractor could not get, and if the carrier's pay for carrying the mail was greater than the amount coming to the contractor, there would be nothing coming to the contractor, and as there would be nothing coming to the contractor, there would be nothing coming to Vaile. Consequently Vaile saw if they were losing routes that he had no possible hope of being paid by the Government. He knew he could not be paid by Miner, because Miner, as he says, was insolvent. He did not know anything about Peck, and he did not know anything about Dorsey, whether solvent or insolvent. He had then no hope of being paid by the Government. He had no hope of being paid by Miner. He had no knowledge that he ever could be paid by Peck or John W. Dorsey. I ask you, gentlemen of the jury, to tell me where was the hope of this enterprising, financially successful man to be reimbursed his money if that hope did not find its place of origin and existence in an agreement and an arrangement by which these routes by some manipulation or some fraud were to be converted from losing into gaining routes. Otherwise there was no hope or prospect of payment; there was no prospect of reimbursement from any source. All the money paid by the United States had to go to pay the carriers. Miner was bankrupt, and Dorsey and Peck he knew nothing about. He was, therefore, just throwing his money away uselessly for the benefit of the United States, a thing which I say shocks your understanding with regard to such a man as Vaile. To come back, then, gentlemen, after all this digression, to the plain, simple, naked, and prominent truths in the transaction, they stand out just exactly as I presented them to you in the first place, unchanged, unmodified, and undimmed by anything that has been said.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, I think at this point, especially as I see Mr. Ingersoll in court, it would be as well for me to take up and present to you some parts of his speech in which he attempted to show Rerdell to have been contradicted.

Gentlemen, I will now take up the counsel's speech on the subject referred to. It is hardly out of place either, because the next subject which I propose to consider, gentlemen, will be S. W. Dorsey in connection with Montfort C. Rerdell, the master and pupil, and I propose to follow them along through their lives in this transaction, lives which were pleasant and lovely, and compare the two, and take you as far as I can into the spirit of their intercourse with each other. I propose to show you how, many years ago, S. W. Dorsey, then a rising man of great intellect, took this young man, Rerdell, by the hand, brought him from the wilds of Arkansas to the city of Washington, taught him here the ways of iniquity, and, having debauched him, used the moral wreck he had made for his own personal benefit and emolument. Before I come to that I desire to call your attention, as I say, to some portions of Mr. Ingersoll's speech, in which he attacked Rerdell, where, with all due respect to the eloquent gentleman, I think he is in error.

At page 5326, Mr. Ingersoll says :

According to this letter—

Speaking of the letter of July, 1882—

among other things he was to have an office, the steamboat route was to be reinstated, the Jennings claim was to be allowed, his father-in-law was to get a clerkship, and according to this letter he also was to have a position.

Now that, Mr. Ingersoll says, is what was in the letter. Correct me in anything, if I am in error. The letter is on page 3733. After stating some general matters, which I need not read, the paragraph next to the last—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] That was the Dorsey letter.

Mr. MERRICK. The letter of Rerdell to Dorsey.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No. I understood it to be a letter of Dorsey to Rerdell. That is what I understood when I was speaking of it. On page 5326, I think, I referred to the letter that Mr. Rerdell says that Dorsey wrote to him on the night that Dorsey left New York. Here it is. I am now giving Mr. Rerdell's report of the letter:

The letter started out by stating that he did not believe the report that had been brought to him in reference to myself, and that he also believed the affidavit story to be a lie. He plead in the letter for the sake of his wife and children and himself, and his social and business relations, and the friendship that had long existed between us not to do anything for his injury; for God's sake to reconsider everything that I had done and take no steps further until he could see me. It was in that strain, simply begging me not to do anything further until he could see me.

That letter was written in June, 1881, according to Mr. Rerdell's testimony. It is a letter claimed by Rerdell to have been written by Dorsey to him, Rerdell.

Mr. MERRICK. That does not say anything about position, office, or anything of that kind.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You are mistaken either in your page or in your subject.

Mr. MERRICK. I am mistaken probably in the page. Here is what you say, cut out from your speech:

According to this letter, among other things he was to have an office, the steamboat route was to be reinstated, the Jennings claim was to be allowed, his father-in-law was to get a clerkship, and according to this letter he also was to have a position.

What letter is that?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The letter of July 5, 1882, must be the letter referred to. Mr. Rerdell states in that letter that had he remained with the Government he would by this time have had a good position.

Mr. MERRICK. Now we are all right. It is that letter you refer to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It must have been. If you will find me the page I will show it.

Mr. MERRICK. He says to the jury, referring to this letter:

According to this letter, what? Among other things he was to have an office.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is improperly reported.

Mr. MERRICK. [Continuing to read:]

The steamboat route was to be reinstated, the Jennings claim was to be allowed, his father-in-law was to get a clerkship, and according to this letter he was also to have a position.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is a mistake there. It should not be according to this letter, but according to his testimony before.

Mr. MERRICK. It is printed "According to this letter."

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is a mistake. According to his testimony he was to have the other things, and then, according to this letter, he was to have a position in addition.

Mr. MERRICK. There is no such thing in the testimony; nothing of the kind.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me call your attention to it.

Mr. MERRICK. You cannot do it.

The COURT. Whilst you are looking for it we will take our recess.

At this point (1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court and gentlemen, I made a reference to Mr. Ingersoll's remarks as of page 5326. The reference should have been page 5328, where he says, referring to the letter of July 5, 1882:

According to this letter, among other things he was to have an office, the steamboat route was to be reinstated, the Jennings claim was to be allowed, his father-in-law was to get a clerkship, and according to this letter he also was to have a position.

I propose, gentlemen of the jury, to show you how inaccurate Mr. Ingersoll was in commenting upon Rerdell and in attempting to show you throughout his speech for two or three days that Rerdell was not to be believed because so flatly contradicted by other testimony in the case. When I came to look at the speech and examine it I was amazed to find how many errors there were of that class and character in the speech of a man who had undertaken to criticise two of the clearest, most concise, accurate, and logical arguments ever made in a court of justice, namely, the two arguments made by Messrs. Ker and Bliss. His object was to convince you by his attack on those gentlemen that Mr. Bliss especially was not entitled to be regarded as a correct "encyclopedia" of the records and testimony in the case, as every lawyer in the case, as well as the court, had come to regard him. Out of all his mighty efforts, with all his auxiliaries to help him, he found in that lofty and able argument only some seven or eight mistakes which any man might make in the heat and rapidity of discussion. Let us see how accurate Mr. Ingersoll is.

This letter of which he speaks says not one word about the steamboat route. It says not one word about the Jennings claim. It says not one word about his father-in-law. The only thing in the letter which sustains what Mr. Ingersoll says is that he expected to get a good position. The statement of Mr. Ingersoll, therefore, that in the letter, among other things, he was to have an office is not so. The statement that the letter referred to the steamboat route is not so. The statement that the Jennings claim was to be allowed is not so. The statement that his father-in-law was to have a clerkship is not so. The only statement that Mr. Ingersoll made in all that paragraph that was correct and true is the statement that Rerdell says he expected to get a good position.

On page 5342 Mr. Ingersoll says as follows:

On page 2215 Rerdell swears that Miner told him that the amounts in the bids were filled in by S. W. Dorsey. On page 4177 Miner denies this, and says that he filled in the bids with only two exceptions.

Now, what is the fact? This statement of Mr. Ingersoll's is true in part only. On page 3875 S. W. Dorsey swears, referring to the original bids on the bidding-book:

Q. How many of those bids did you change?—A. Well, I changed no bid at all. Do not confound these things. The amount was written in pencil on the edges of the Government advertising book, from which they would make up their bids. It was not a bid.

Q. How many of those amounts did you change?—A. I don't remember. I do remember changing two, as my memory has been refreshed as to them. I don't know exactly on what routes they were, but I think on the Bismarck and Tongue River route and The Dalles and Baker City route.

Q. How has your memory been refreshed on the subject?—A. By the evidence that has been given in court here.

Q. Whose evidence?—A. The evidence of Mr. Boone, I think. I think it was Mr. Boone. You can turn to it and see. Then I have talked with Mr. Boone about it since.

Q. On page 1585 Mr. Boone was asked this question:

“Q. Were the estimates which you made used at all?—A. Some might have been used, and some were not. I know one or two very important ones that were not used.

“Q. Were your estimates reduced?—A. Yes, sir; on The Dalles and Baker City route they were reduced $3,000.”

Did you make that reduction?—A. My impression is that I did. I do not know the amount, but I think I made a change there, or suggested a change.

Q. Did you not strike out the figures that were there and write in your own hand the substituted figures on the book?—A. Well, if I wrote anything at all there it would be in my own hand.

Q. I did not ask you if you did. Do you recollect that you did?—A. I do not remember just in what form, but I have a recollection that I did suggest a change on that route.

Q. On page 1586 Boone says:

“A. As I stated before, one route particularly attracted my attention, and that was the route from The Dalles to Baker City, in which the figures that I had suggested, $11,888, were reduced to $8,888.”

What is your recollection about that?—A. I presume Mr. Boone's recollection is better than my own. I know that I suggested a change there. Just as to the amount I cannot say.

Q. Boone goes on further:

“How were the other routes?—A. To the best of my recollection they were all reduced.”

That is what Boone says, and Dorsey has just before said that Boone's recollection is more reliable than his:

Have you any recollection of reducing more than two?—A. No, sir; I may have reduced more, but the only recollection that I have is of the two. I may have suggested a reduction. I did not reduce them. I may have suggested a reduction.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Does he say he may have reduced others; if so, what page is that?

Mr. MERRICK. I am reading from page 3875:

Have you any recollection of reducing more than two?—A. No, sir; I MAY HAVE REDUCED MORE, but the only recollection that I have is of the two. I may have suggested a reduction. I did not reduce them. I may have suggested a reduction.

Q. I will accept that. You may have suggested a reduction?—A. Yes, sir.

Now, on page 1586, Boone says:

Q. Were the bids put in the bids you prepared on those circulars, or were the amounts which you fixed as proper amounts arbitrarily reduced?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that. It is exceedingly leading.

The COURT. Yes; and it is objectionable, because it does not relate to new matter brought out by the other side. You will have to put it in a less objectionable form.

Q. State relatively to each other the character of the amounts you indicated as the amounts to be bid for the routes and the character of the amounts finally determined upon.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object.

Mr. WILSON. I object, because that is not the best evidence. It is in writing, and the writing ought to be produced.

The COURT. You can answer the question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to have the question read first.

[The stenographer read the question.]

The COURT. You can answer the question.

A. As I stated before, one route particularly attracted my attention, and that was the route from The Dalles to Baker City, in which the figures that I had suggested, $11,888, were reduced to $8,888.

Q. How were the other routes?—A. To the best of my recollection they were all reduced.

Boone swears that, to the best of his recollection, they were all reduced, and S. W. Dorsey swears, "I presume Mr. Boone's recollection is better than my own." Rerdell says that Miner told him that the amounts in the bids were filled in by S. W. Dorsey. Miner denies this, says Mr. Ingersoll, and says that he filled in the bids with only two exceptions. Now, if there is corroboration anywhere, the testimony as to the fact that S. W. Dorsey reduced all those bids is clear and distinct, and made distinct by Boone. Boone is sustained by S. W. Dorsey stating on his oath that his, Boone's, recollection is more reliable than Dorsey's; and whilst the testimony confirms Rerdell, it condemns Miner.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Where does he say that Dorsey reduced all the routes?

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

As I stated before, one route particularly attracted my attention.

Q. How were the other routes?—A. To the best of my recollection, they were all reduced.

Mr. INGERSOLL. By whom?

Mr. MERRICK. The inference is here, plain and palpable. Miner had the book. Miner exercised no authority. Boone had prepared the substance of the bids. He had obtained the information, on which the amounts were based. Miner brought the book and showed it to Boone, and the amounts were reduced. Boone states that the amounts were reduced. Miner told Boone, as Boone said in his testimony, that he intended to keep the book to show who was responsible for the reduction.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Of those two routes.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir. Boone says it is not limited to those two routes. That statement is unauthorized by the testimony.

Mr. Ingersoll says, on page 5342:

On page 2217 Rerdell swears that S. W. Dorsey applied to him to go West. On page 3768 Dorsey swears that he did not employ him to go West.

Mr. Ingersoll uses that as a contradiction of Rerdell. Did Rerdell say that Dorsey had employed him? Rerdell says Dorsey applied to him to go West. Dorsey swears that he did not employ him to go West. Did not Dorsey apply to him to go West? Did not Dorsey send him West? Let us see how fair the counsel is in that statement. Rerdell swears, on page 2213:

Q. Miner's room?—A. Yes, sir. Mr. Miner was not here at that time. All the spare time I could have from my duties under the District government I would devote there in writing letters and sending out communications to subcontractors and postmasters and things of that kind that would naturally come through the hands of the contractor, and continued in that way until about, I will say, to be accurate, between the 5th and 10th of July, and then he asked me if I did not want to take a Western trip.

Q. What did you say to that?—A. I asked him where it was and he said Dakota and Montana Territory, and remarked that it was a pleasant time of the year to go there and that all my expenses would be paid. He asked if I could get leave of absence from the District government. I replied that I would try. He said, "If they refuse it, I will go and see that you get it; make your application." I made my application for leave of thirty days, and it was granted; and on the night of the 11th I left here.

By the COURT:

Q. The 11th of July?—A. Yes, sir; it took several days to get the leave of absence and to get some other matters arranged, and then I left for Dakota.

On page 2218 he says:

Q. For what particular purpose were you to go West?—A. I was to go West for the purpose of assisting John W. Dorsey in putting service on the route from Bismarck, Dakota, to Tongue River, Montana, or Fort Keogh, as they called it then, I believe.

Q. Did you go?—A. I did; leaving here on the night of the 11th of July.

Q. Did you receive any instructions before leaving?—A. I did.

Q. From whom?—A. From Senator Dorsey.

Q. Did you receive any money or were you given a credit upon which to draw at the time you left?—A. I was, but I would have to explain how that was done. I got no direct credit to me in my name.

Q. Did you receive any money?—A. I did.

Q. How much?—A. One thousand five hundred dollars.

Q. From whom?—A. Senator Dorsey.

Q. Now, will you explain the credit?—A. He went with me to the German-American National Bank, on the corner of F and Seventh streets, and placed to the credit of John W. Dorsey & Co. $3,000, causing me to sign the firm name of John W. Dorsey & Co. on the signature book, so that they would know who drew the drafts.

Q. Did you sign the firm-name?—A. I did sign the firm-name of John W. Dorsey & Co., and he placed to the credit of John W. Dorsey & Co., for me to draw out over the signature that I signed on the signature book, $3,000.

Q. How much money did you say you took?—A. He gave me $1,500 in money and a credit to John W. Dorsey & Co. of $3,000.

Is all that a fact that Rerdell there states? Let us see. Dorsey says, on page 3768:

Do you know anything about employing him to go West?—A. Yes, sir; I did not employ him to go West.

Q. Just state what there is about it.—A. About the time that he states there, about the 10th or 12th of July, the service on the route from Bismarck to Tongue River I think had not been started. At all events, John W. Dorsey, who was in charge of it, was in great trouble about getting it started, and Rerdell told me that his vacation would begin the 15th of July and he was going West somewhere, and I suggested to him to go up there and help John put the service on that route. My reason for doing that was—

Mr. MERRICK. Wait a moment; I object.

*Mr. INGERSOLL. Let him give his reason. It is the same thing right over and over.

The COURT. He can give his reason for sending him out,

Says the court, understanding precisely what the testimony meant.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Certainly.

Mr. Ingersoll acquiesced at the time in what the testimony meant, that Dorsey was sending him out.

A. [Continuing.] My reason for doing that was that if that service failed, and then it looked very much as if it would, the bondsmen who were on all these bonds at my request would probably lose a great deal of money and I would feel in honor bound to protect them against that loss.

His reason for doing what? His reason for sending Rerdell out West.

That is the reason why at that time I took such an active interest in having this service started.

Q. Because you felt under obligations to protect the bondsmen?—A. Yes, sir; if there had been a failure there would have been a great deal of money lost by them. Of course it was understood that if one route failed all the rest would fail in the name of that contractor.

Q. When Mr. Rerdell started for the West did you furnish him with any money or any means of getting credit?—A. Yes, sir; I think I did.

Q. For the purpose of assisting John W. Dorsey?—A. I think I did.

Q. Do you remember the amount?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you remember whether he had any certified check?—A. I do not know that. Perhaps he did.

Q. You do not remember just the amount that you gave him?—A. No; but I think $3,000. The checks would show that.

Q. Do you know whether you placed that amount to his credit or to the credit of any member of that firm?—A. I think that I placed it to the credit of John W. Dorsey & Co., and then I think I went to the bank with Rerdell and told Mr. Austin, the assistant cashier, or Dr. Prentiss, I don't know which, that Rerdell was authorized to draw this money out by signing the name of John W. Dorsey & Co., for the reason that John W. Dorsey—if I can give my reason—was absent on the line somewhere, or I supposed he was, and Rerdell, on the way up, would probably have to purchase horses or grain and so on before he saw John W. Dorsey.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, was that fair, was that dealing in frankness with a man he was seeking to kill, as he says he was? Is it fair to assassinate a man instead of meeting him in open fight? Was it fair as a contradiction to use language of this sort?

On page 2217 Rerdell swears that S. W. Dorsey applied to him to go West. On page 3768 Dorsey swears that he did not employ him to go West.

That is the contradiction furnished by Mr. Ingersoll. I am obliged to him for it, for in searching out the unfairness of his attempted contradiction of Rerdell it led me to the confirmation of Rerdell out of the mouth of S. W. Dorsey himself. S. W. Dorsey applied to him to go West. S. W. Dorsey says so. S. W. Dorsey told him to go West to assist John W. Dorsey in putting service on the Tongue River route. S. W. Dorsey assisted in getting his leave. S. W. Dorsey gave him $3,000 in money; and further on it is in proof from Dorsey that he provided him with passes and sent him out West to do this business; and further on it is shown and conceded that he went out and did the business upon which he went.

But, gentlemen, let me pause here for a moment to consider one very peculiar and extraordinary circumstance in this transaction. S. W. Dorsey has given you as a reason for his active interest in these routes that he wanted to take care of his bondsmen. Let us see if that is true. If I am not mistaken Boone swears and it is in proof from John W. Dorsey that Boone and John W. Dorsey were the only members of the firm of John W. Dorsey & Co. At the time S. W. Dorsey sent Rerdell out West Boone was here in the city. John W. Dorsey was not here, but Boone, a member of the firm, was here in the city. How dared a stranger to that firm go to a bank in the city of Washington and order a credit in the name of that firm? How dared a stranger to that firm, not a member of the firm, having no interest in the affairs of the firm, having no authority over the contracts and dealings of the firm, go to a bank and take with him a man and authorize that man to draw indefinitely on that bank in the name of the firm?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Was Boone interested in the Tongue River route?

Mr. MERRICK. He was a member of the firm of John W. Dorsey & Co.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But was he interested in the Tongue River route?

Mr. MERRICK. I am not speaking of that, and am not able to answer at this moment. Was he not a member of the firm of John W. Dorsey & Co.? Did not S. W. Dorsey take Rerdell to the bank and authorize him to draw on John W. Dorsey & Co.? He deposited $3,000 to the credit of that firm, and authorized Rerdell to sign the name of John W. Dorsey & Co. S. W. Dorsey did not open that account. S. W. Dorsey did not know how much was to be placed to the credit of that account, and if $20,000 had been placed there the day after the arrangement made between S. W. Dorsey and the bank, Rerdell could have drawn out every cent. And yet they tell us that S. W. Dorsey at that time had no interest in the transaction. Gentlemen, they ask you to extend credulity beyond even the limits of stupidity.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I presume you want to state all that there is on that subject. Mr. Rerdell swears that he had a balance left.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes. That was afterwards. He did not steal the money, and did not want to steal it. He never meant to steal it. But the power was given. The authority was given.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He had a balance left and when he came back he turned it over to Vaile and Miner. Why did he turn it over to Vaile and Miner?

Mr. MERRICK. Is that a proper interruption? He turned it over to Vaile and Miner, because they were all one and the same, and it did not make any odds to whom he turned it over, provided it was to one or more of the combination. Now, gentlemen, do not let us enter into any argument upon incidental matters.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All right.

Mr. MERRICK. I appeal to you, Mr. Crane, would you have dared to do such a thing as to go to the Bank of Washington and take Mr. Woodward with you, and, referring to an account of a firm in this city, say, "I want you to go and look after some matters in which that firm is incidentally interested, and I am going to put $3,000 to the credit of that firm. Write your name. Mr. James, I want you to recognize Mr. Woodward as authorized to draw on that account." Would you dare to do such a thing?

Mr. INGERSOLL. To draw for how much?

Mr. MERRICK. Indefinitely, for he did not limit the amount.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; only for $3,000.

Mr. MERRICK. It was not limited to $3,000. He was to draw on that account and sign the firm-name of John W. Dorsey & Co.

Mr. INGERSOLL. For limited a amount.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; he was to sign the name of that firm and there is no evidence of any limit. The only evidence is that Dorsey put $3,000 there, but left Rerdell's ability to draw unlimited.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have found the page on which I spoke of that letter.

Mr. MERRICK. I have already referred to it in your absence. I have passed that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to make a statement if you will look at the page while I read it.

The Government must have promised the gentleman an office when he went, in June, 1881, to Woodward and to Clayton and to the Attorney-General and to the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MERRICK. That is not what I referred to. I referred to this expression, following your example in criticising my associates:

According to this letter, among other things he was to have an office, the steamboat route was to be reinstated, the Jennings claim was to be allowed, his father-in-law was to get a clerkship, and according to this letter he also was to have a position.

Is there anything in the letter about those subjects at all?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is not properly reported.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, well, I cannot help that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is merely the question of a punctuation mark:

According to this letter, among other things he was to have an office.

That is all there is about that letter. Then there commences a new sentence:

The steamboat route was to be reinstated.

That was according to the evidence, and not according to the letter.

Mr. MERRICK. It does not say so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Reading:]

His father-in-law was to have a clerkship, and according to this letter he also was to have a position.

The reporter should have put a period at the end of the word "office."

According to this letter, among other things, he was to have an office. The steamboat route was to be reinstated.

And so forth. The letter says nothing on that subject.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, gentlemen of the jury, I do not want to enter into a discussion with the learned counsel about punctuation and the use of the English language, but I think his explanation makes it worse than it was before.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well. If you so consider it, go on.

Mr. MERRICK. It could not have been that a gentleman so familiar with the use of the English language would have interpolated that expression resting upon some other basis than the letter in such a sentence as this, which begins with the letter and ends with the letter:

According to this letter, among other things he was to have an office.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Stop right there.

Mr. MERRICK:

The steamboat route was to be reinstated. The Jennings claim was to be allowed and his father-in-law was to have a clerkship.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Go on.

Mr. MERRICK:

And according to this letter he also was to have a position.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let the court state whether that is not perfectly correct.

Mr. MERRICK. The court is not teaching a grammar school. Probably the learned gentleman's punctuation in reference to the correction of his mistake has about as near a relation to the real subject as Dorsey's recollection of his possibly having punctuated that affidavit of 1881, which I will show you he and the learned counsel helped write, according to Dorsey's own testimony, when I get to it.

Now, gentlemen, in connection with this statement about Rerdell's having been applied to or employed to go West, let me refer to page 3820 of S. W. Dorsey's cross-examination:

Q. Did you not send Mr. Rerdell West in the spring or summer of 1878 to look after these same routes?—A. As I stated in my direct testimony, I asked Rerdell to use his vacation to go out and help John W. Dorsey on the Bismarck and Tongue River route.

Q. When was that?—A. I should think it was in July, probably.

Q. 1878?—A. 1878.

Q. Was that done at your suggestion?—A. That was done, I presume, at my own suggestion. At all events, I assume the responsibility for it.

Q. Where was John W. Dorsey at that time?—A. I supposed that he was somewhere on this line, but it appears from the information I have since got that he was not. He was buying horses out in Minnesota, I believe.

Q. Where was Peck?—A. Peck was in New Mexico.

Q. Where was Miner?—A. Well, of course I do not want to answer questions of this sort when I was not personally present to know, but I think he was in Denver.

Q. Where was Boone?—A. I believe he was here, though I do not know.

Q. Did you not procure passes for Rerdell to go West?—A. I do not remember, but I suppose I did.

Q. Have you any recollection of procuring passes for him?—A. No, sir; but I have no doubt I did.

Q. Did you give him letters of introduction?—A. I think I did.

Q. Did you give him any forms of petitions?—A. That I do not remember.

Q. Did you give him any money?

The WITNESS. For himself?

Mr. MERRICK. Did you put in his control or his possession any funds?

A. I think I did.

Q. How much?—A. I believe $3,000; but as to that I will not make an absolute statement. I think it was $3,000.

Q. Did you give him any instructions as to building ranches or organizing post-offices along on routes connecting with the Tongue River route?

The WITNESS. As to building ranches?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

A. I think the ranches were mostly built at that time.

Q. That is not an answer to my question.—A. I don't remember whether I did or not.

Bear that in mind, gentlemen.

Q. Did you give him any instructions as to building ranches or organizing post-offices along on routes connecting with the Tongue River route?

That relates to the fraudulent side office.

A. I don't remember whether I did or not.

Q. You don't remember whether you gave him any instructions or not?—A. No, sir; I gave him general instructions to go out there and assist John W. Dorsey in putting that service on, for the reason that at that time I was afraid it was going to fail.

Q. Did you give him any instructions about petitions for expeditions and increase?—

A. Possibly.

Q. Did you not tell him that the route would be increased?—A. I may have told him so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Read the balance of it, please.

Whether I told him so or not, I believed it.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

Whether I told him so or not, I believed it.

He had good reason to believe it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Certainly he did.

Mr. MERRICK. He knew it would be.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He thought it would be.

Mr. MERRICK. He knew it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No.

Mr. MERRICK. He knew it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He did not say so.

Mr. MERRICK. I know he did not but he knew it. He told Rerdell to go and tell them that it would be; not that he believed it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He does not say so.

Mr. MERRICK. He says, "I may have told him that. I may have done it." Rerdell says he did, and Rerdell told them so out there. Rerdell was doing Dorsey's work. He was doing Dorsey's bidding. He had no interest but Dorsey's to subserve. Certainly under those circumstances he did not himself conceive the idea. He swears positively that Dorsey gave him the instructions, and it is in proof that he executed the instructions. Dorsey swears that possibly or probably he did give those instructions to him.

Q. Then you say that you directed Rerdell to go out there and help John W. Dorsey, and that you gave him passes and letters?—A. Yes, sir.

Let us go on a little further. I will come back to the Western trip and I will prove to you by the circumstances, gentlemen, that Dorsey instructed him to get up that side post-office. I will prove it to you conclusively and to your satisfaction. It was all conceived in S. W. Dorsey's brain.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to have you read what he says about that route being increased.

Mr. MERRICK. I have read enough. I have shown that you have not dealt fairly with this evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He gives the reason.

Mr. MERRICK. I am showing that you have not dealt fairly with Rerdell.

Mr. Ingersoll says, on page 5342 :

On page 2218 Rerdell swears that he received instructions from S. W. Dorsey as to what to do on the Bismarck route. On page 3769 S. W. Dorsey swears that that is utterly untrue.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What is the page ?

Mr. MERRICK. I gave the page, and I must ask counsel to bear it in mind. It interrupts me to have to give it a second time. The page is 5342, the statement of Rerdell on page 2218, and the statement of S. W. Dorsey on page 3769. Rerdell in fact says, on page 2218 :

Q. Did you receive any instructions before leaving ?—A. I did.

Q. From whom ?—A. From Senator Dorsey.

Q. Did you receive any money or were you given a credit upon which to draw at the time you left ?—A. I was, but I would have to explain how that was done. I got no direct credit to me in my name.

Q. Did you receive any money ?—A. I did.

Q. How much ?—A. One thousand five hundred dollars.

Q. From whom ?—A. Senator Dorsey.

Q. Now, will you explain the credit ?

He then explains the credit of $3,000 and says that he was authorized to sign the firm-name. Now, in Dorsey's testimony, at page 3769 :

Q. On page 2219, Rerdell being asked about the instructions that you gave him, said :

"Among the instructions that he gave me was one to the effect that I was to arrange for an office. He first furnished me with the necessary blanks for the establishment of post-offices. The Post-Office Department furnished the blank applications to be filled up. He furnished me with some of those blanks, explaining how they were to be filled up, and said the advertised distance was short, and when I put the men out over the road, to make an application for an office off to one side, at an angle, giving me a little draft of what he wanted, and to have it sent to the Post-Office Department.

"Q. How far off from the line of the Tongue River route did he indicate that this new post-office was to be ?—A. I was to put it far enough off to get an increase of distance of about sixty miles, that being about the distance that the line was short."

You may state whether you ever gave him any such instructions, or what instructions you gave on the subject.—A. That is utterly untrue. I never gave him instructions of any kind on that subject.

Now, gentlemen, before I go on I will pause to enlighten you a little about the instructions as to that side post-office. Did S. W. Dorsey give Rerdell instructions about that side post-office ? You remember that Rerdell went out there. You remember that he saw John W. Dorsey. You remember that John W. Dorsey says he got a petition for that side post-office from Rerdell. You remember he gave that petition to Lounsberry and that Lounsberry declined to participate in the scheme. You remember that Rerdell talked with Pennell about that side post-office. The plan was to run out some sixty miles to the north of the Tongue River route into an uninhabited region and to have the men that were working on the Tongue River route sign the petition, to have one of them for postmaster, and then to carry out the fraud by having fictitious returns made. There was no population. It was a perfect wilderness, where even the wild beasts roamed undisturbed by the sportsman's gun.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Where is the testimony about the fictitious returns?

Mr. MERRICK. I infer that from the character of the fraud. The nearest station agent or one of the men was to be the postmaster. Now, you see, gentlemen, this scheme for getting money out of the Government, this scheme which Lounsberry would not carry out, and which John W. Dorsey himself repudiated as a wrongful act on his part, claiming that it was the only wrongful act he had done in this business, and the scheme for getting the side post-office is traced back to the brain of Rerdell? John W. Dorsey got the scheme and the petition from Rerdell. Where did Rerdell get it? What interest had Rerdell in that side post-office? What interest had he in defrauding the Government? He gave it to John W. Dorsey and told John W. Dorsey how the thing was to be done. Now, gentlemen, does it stand to reason that Rerdell got that scheme up just because he loved mischief? Is it not satisfactory to your minds as a conclusion from the circumstances that Rerdell was carrying out the mandate of S. W. Dorsey who not only wanted the service put on that route, but wanted that route made more profitable? Rerdell had no interest in it on the face of the earth. Nobody pretends that he had. He had no knowledge of mail matters at that time. None on earth. He was sent out there by S. W. Dorsey and had no personal knowledge or familiarity with mail matters. He suggested this scheme to John W. Dorsey. Did he conceive it himself or was it conceived by the man whose fruitful brain had devised new covenants in the subcontracts unknown to previous contractors, that man whose fruitful brain had repudiated the contracts drawn by Boone, and who substituted for the covenant Boone had written a covenant drawn by his own hand and given to Boone to be inserted. We must have some common-sense, gentlemen, in dealing with these things. Whilst oratory adorns and pleases, still it is utterly useless if it is without facts and without reason.

Mr. Ingersoll says, on page 5343, at the bottom:

On page 2224 Rerdell swears that in November, 1878, Miner asked him to write certain words in a line on petition 40104. On page 4178, Miner swears that he never asked him to interline any petition.

On page 4191, Miner admits that he himself altered one of these petitions as Rerdell says he did, writing in the word "Ehrenberg." Miner also forged some six names to another petition. He does not admit that he forged those names. He don't know whether he did or whether he did not. It is in proof by all the witnesses who testified to handwriting that Miner wrote them. Miner's counsel brought Mr. Waugh on the stand, expecting him to prove that Miner had not written them, and asked him in all the glory of a prospective triumph, "Who wrote those six names?" "Why, Miner wrote them without doubt." Afterwards Mr. Bliss says, with a keenness of sarcasm that I wish I could imitate, but which I will quote as I cannot imitate, "I can imagine Brother Henkle and Mr. Waugh in private converse after he came off the stand, and Brother Henkle saying, 'Why, Mr. Waugh, what do you mean?' 'What is the matter? I thought that was just what you wanted Mr. Henkle.'" That was on the Camp McDermitt route, you recollect. But, gentlemen of the jury, after what we have seen of Mr. Miner and the Hayes letter, they cannot contradict Rerdell or anybody else by him. I do not profess to kill as Mr. Ingersoll did. I only profess to push aside witnesses who cannot be believed, and say, "You may live, but keep your mouth shut until you learn how to tell the truth."

On page 5344 Mr. Ingersoll says:

On page 2231 Rerdell swears that he filled in blanks under the direction of S. W. Dorsey—that is, of the Perkins affidavit—and filed it under the direction of S. W. Dorsey. On page 3793 Dorsey swears that he never knew there was such an affidavit, and that he never gave such instructions; and more than that, that he never at any time or place gave Rerdell authority to change any affidavit or any petition that was to be filed.

On page 3945 Dorsey says:

Q. Did you give Rerdell directions as to filling up one of these blank affidavits?—

A. Well, the only recollection I have about that is that he telegraphed me, or wrote me, when I was West, in 1879, that the department required a shorter schedule on two routes, I think, but what reply I made to him I don't remember.

Q. Did you not direct him to fill up a blank affidavit and preserve the proportion of 150 to 200 per cent.?—A. Oh, I don't think I did.

Q. What is your recollection about giving him directions as to filling up the affidavit?—A. My recollection is that I did not, but I don't know; it is possible that I might have done it.

Is that a contradiction of Rerdell?

“It is possible that I might have done it;” “I don't know;” “I don't think I did;” “I don't remember;” “but it is possible I might have done it.” Gentlemen, do you not see, lying behind there, knowledge in Dorsey's bosom of the fact, from the use of language that would be a shield against perjury and at the same time an evasion of the truth? “I might have done it.” It is conclusively shown that Dorsey himself filled up one of John W. Dorsey's affidavits of the 21st of April on the Pueblo and Rosita route, whilst Rerdell was absent from the city in the far West. I need not go back on that discussion and repeat it. But I have gone over it carefully with you, and I am satisfied that you retain all I said in distinct remembrance.

On page 5354 Mr. Ingersoll says:

On page 2223 Rerdell says that in August, 1878, he had a talk with Miner, who said that they could do nothing while Boone was in the combination; that Brady was hostile to Boone, and that Boone's place was to be taken by Vaile; and that Miner asked his opinion about Vaile, and asked what Rerdell thought about Dorsey's approving it, adding that Vaile was very close to Brady. On page 4177 Miner swears that he has no recollection of the conversation, and does not believe any such conversation ever occurred.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You referred to page 3793.

Mr. MERRICK. Did I refer to page 3793?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. I referred to what you quoted; that is all I referred to. Have I quoted it right?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not know.

Mr. MERRICK. Have I quoted correctly from what was there?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did not follow you; I presume you did.

Mr. MERRICK. If I did, that is all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wanted to call your attention——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I did not want to be unfair, your honor.

The COURT. Let him state his proposition.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me say to the court that the great question is about filling up blank affidavits after they were sworn to.

Q. Now, I will ask you whether at any time or any place you ever gave Mr. Rerdell any order, or any authority, or made any suggestion to him, to change any affidavit, any petition, or any paper that was to be filed in the Post-Office Department in connection with any mail route?

Mr. Merrick read that.

The WITNESS. That is, after the paper was complete?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

A. No, sir; I never did.

That is, "I never gave him any authority to touch a paper after it had been sworn to."

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Ingersoll's statement was that Dorsey—never knew there was such an affidavit, and that he never gave such instructions; and more than that, that he never at any time or place gave Rerdell authority to change any affidavit or any petition that was to be filed—

After it had been sworn to. I showed you, gentlemen of the jury, when I was discussing the John W. Dorsey affidavits, that S. W. Dorsey filled that affidavit up after it was sworn to. I showed it to you, in connection with the circumstances, so conclusively that it was better proof than the positive evidence of a man that had seen it done. I am not going back on the argument, however, to repeat it.

The COURT. It has to go to the jury, in any event.

Mr. MERRICK. On page 5345 Mr. Ingersoll said:

On page 3771 S. W. Dorsey swears that he never instructed Rerdell to get any affidavits in blank. On pages 4126 and 4107 J. W. Dorsey swears that he made none in blank; that he has no recollection of any such thing. On page 2240, Rerdell swears that he had a conversation with S. W. Dorsey about getting blank affidavits. On page 3771 S. W. Dorsey denies it?

It would be a useless waste of time for me to pause upon the moral wreck which is all that is left of John W. Dorsey. The affidavits have been shown to you to have been gotten up in blank. The affidavits have been shown to you to have been sent on to John W. Dorsey in blank, and sworn to by him in blank; to have come back here, and to have been filled up here; and that circumstance corroborates Rerdell.

At page 5354 Mr. Ingersoll says:

On page 2223 Rerdell says that in August, 1878, he had a talk with Miner, who said that they could do nothing while Boone was in the combination; that Brady was hostile to Boone, and that Boone's place was to be taken by Vaile; and that Miner asked his opinion about Vaile, and asked what Rerdell thought about Dorsey's approving it, adding that Vaile was very close to Brady. On page 4177 Miner swears that he has no recollection of the conversation, and does not believe any such conversation ever occurred.

Now, gentlemen, is this the fact? If it is, the conversation did take place. Let us see. Boone says, at page 1529:

Q. What did Miner say to you in that connection?—A. On the 8th day of August, 1878, Mr. Miner sent for me to come to the house of Stephen W. Dorsey. Dorsey was absent from the city at the time. He said to me, "It is a matter of impossibility for us to raise the amount necessary to go on with the balance of this service, and it is useless for me to tell you the position we are in; you can see it yourself," and I did see it, and signed the paper going out of the concern.

Q. What did he say about Vaile?—A. He said Mr. Vaile was coming in because he had the means necessary to put the service on.

Q. Did you have any conversation with S. W. Dorsey in reference to Vaile?—A. I had a conversation about Mr. Vaile with S. W. Dorsey pending the letting or the award of the contracts.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Stephen W. Dorsey about Vaile's coming into the concern?—A. I never had any conversation with him about his coming into the concern. He asked me the question about Mr. Vaile's financial ability, his standing as a mail contractor, and his ability to handle mail contracts, and probably from the conversation I inferred that Mr. Vaile would be brought into the concern.

Q. At what time was that conversation; do you recollect?—A. That conversation must have occurred within thirty days after the awards were made; either in the latter part of March or the first part of April.

Pausing for a moment, you will see that even then Stephen W. Dorsey was preparing to bring Vaile in, either in the latter part of March or first part of April, before the loving embrace between Miner and Vaile:

Q. At what time did your conversation with Stephen W. Dorsey take place in which he asked you what was the occasion of Brady's hostility to you?—A. That occurred before the contracts went into execution, before the 1st of July, 1878, and I think it grew out of the fact of my putting in a bid——

Q. [Interposing.] No matter about what it grew out of. It occurred before July, 1878?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When was the conversation between you and Miner?

Between Boone and Miner.

He asked me, says he, "What is the trouble between you and General Brady?"

Mr. INGERSOLL. What page is it, please?

Mr. MERRICK. 1530.

Q. When was the conversation between you and Miner?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to have the balance of the answer to the preceding question. I do not understand that the witness quite answered.

Mr. MERRICK. Go on and finish it. Counsel on the other side want it.

The COURT. Do you desire to have it?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let him tell what it is.

A. [Continuing.] As Mr. Miner had the award of the contract for the service on the Bismarck and Tongue River route, and as the department was anxious to put on service previous to the contract going into execution, I filed a proposal for that service for the month of June, 1878, a very low proposal for the service.

Mr. HENKLE. That was the month before the service was put on.

The WITNESS. Yes; the month before the service was put on, and it grew out of that fact that the service was not ordered on; it grew out of the fact that Brady was hostile towards me that he would not award the service.

As to Brady's actual hostility to Boone, it is shown by the proof that it was desired to put special service on this route before the time for the commencement of the service under the four years' contract, and Boone put in a very low bid to put on service for the month preceding the July when, under the contract, it was to be put on, and Brady would not award it to Boone, Boone says, because of his (Brady's) hostility to him (Boone)—a relation of hostility which, your honor will now see, was well known to these parties, and knowing that, they had to get rid of Boone.

The COURT. In connection with that proposed service to commence on the 1st of June, a month in advance of the regular service on that particular route (Bismarck to Tongue River), I remember a letter written by General Miles, I believe, to Brady, in which he refers to a conversation he had had with Brady the winter preceding—that is, the winter of 1877-'78—in regard to the importance of service upon that route for the purpose of accommodating the military out there. That letter, I think, I cannot be mistaken about. That letter refers, I think, to a conversation between General Miles and Brady in the winter of 1877-'78, and when you spoke of this service for the month of June I connected it with that letter.

Mr. MERRICK. Probably it was on that account he desired to put on service there before the 1st of July. Boone put in a low bid, but Brady would not let him have it because of his (Brady's) hostility to him (Boone). And this confirms what S. W. Dorsey said upon the subject. On page 1529 Boone states that he had this conversation with S. W. Dorsey:

A. He asked me, says he, "What is the trouble between you and General Brady; why is he so hostile to you?" I says, "It is a matter that I don't understand, and never could understand." Then he repeated to me the remark that General Brady said——

The COURT. [Interposing.] Do not repeat that.

Q. Go on.—A. That was all that was said. That so long as I was in the concern nothing would be done by General Brady for its relief.

The COURT. Do you find that letter, Mr. Bliss ?

Mr. BLISS. I have not found it.

Mr. MERRICK. There is such a letter.

Mr. BLISS. It is a letter referring to the conversation ?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, gentlemen, you have Boone's testimony as to what S. W. Dorsey told him, that nothing would be done as long as Boone remained in. And Rerdell says that in August, 1878, he had a talk with Miner, who said that they could do nothing while Boone was in the combination. Mr. Ingersoll quoted it, and then quoted Miner's denial in refutation of Rerdell. Does not the testimony of Boone as to his conversation with Miner, as to the refusal of Brady to grant him the service on a low bid on that route for the month of June, prior to the commencement of the regular service, and as to his conversation with S. W. Dorsey in which Dorsey says precisely what Rerdell says Miner told him, confirm Rerdell's statement made before this jury ?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The point is as to his being close to Brady.

Mr. MERRICK. The point is everywhere that does not touch the learned counsel.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The point is as to his being close to Brady.

Mr. MERRICK. The conversation is the point ; what they thought of Boone and Boone's relations. You see from what I have read you that they not only understood that Boone and Brady were hostile, but that back in March S. W. Dorsey was preparing to take Vaile in. In point of fact, they simply wanted to use Boone, as they are trying to use him now, and cast him out when he ceased to be useful, as he will find him-cast out now. At page 5354, at the bottom, Mr. Ingersoll says :

On pages 2429 and 2430 Rerdell swears that he had two balance-sheets of the books, made by Donnelly ; that he showed them to MacVeagh and Woodward. How does it happen that Woodward was not sworn about it ? Nothing would have been of more importance, if they wished to prove the existence of the two red books, than to prove by Woodward that Mr. Rerdell, in June, 1881, showed him copies of those balance-sheets or the balance-sheets themselves. They did not bring Mr. Woodward on the stand. Why ? Mr. Woodward, in my judgment, had he come upon the stand, would have sworn to the truth.

James says, at page 2031, in reference to those balance-sheets, which Mr. Ingersoll says we did not prove that Rerdell had in his possession :

Q. Did he say anything about any books ?—A. He exhibited what purported to be transcripts of books ; records of books.

Those were the balance-sheets proved by James. Mr. Ingersoll, in his statement, says that we had not proved them. We proved them by Mr. James to have been in Rerdell's possession at that time ; to have been exhibited to him. Why should we call Woodward to confirm James ? Can we not rely upon James ? Does not this jury rely upon him ? If you doubted his testimony why did not you call Woodward, who sat here ready to be sworn by either side that needed him ? We did not need him. You did need him to contradict James and sustain the statements you had made yourself. Why did they not swear Woodward ? Woodward, they say, would have told the truth. Woodward knew the same facts that James knew. James's testimony was there in the record before the counsel who uttered the statement. He says it was all-important to us to prove that Rerdell had those balance-sheets at that time and that we had not proved it, when, in point of fact, we had proved it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Was not the testimony of James and MacVeagh ruled out ?

Mr. MERRICK. The confessions of Rerdell were ruled out in James's and MacVeagh's testimony, but not James's acts and not Rerdell's acts.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understood that it was all ruled out.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, no; but even if it had been ruled out you should not have made such a statement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Why not?

Mr. MERRICK. But it was not ruled out. At page 5357 Mr. Ingersoll says that Rerdell manufactured the memorandum, marked 31 X, after he had got out of jail last summer.

At page 2022 MacVeagh says—

The COURT. [Interposing.] Before you go to that, Mr. Merrick, I see that my memory was at fault in regard to that letter. It was not a letter of General Miles, but it was a letter of Martin Maginnis, dated July 23, 1878, and addressed to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in which he says:

I have the honor to call your attention to the personal call made on you last winter by General Miles and myself in relation to establishing a daily mail route between Miles City and Bismarck, which, at that time, you may remember, received your favorable consideration. [Page 2140.]

Mr. MERRICK. I do think, gentlemen of the jury, that I have never seen on the bench in my life the equal of his honor in remembrance of the details of this case. I believe to-day he knows more about it than all the lawyers engaged in it.

On page 2022 Mr. MacVeagh says:

Q. In what way did he say it?—A. He said, as I told you, that he had made the entries in this book, as I understood him, from memoranda furnished by Mr. Dorsey.

Kellogg says that the first part of that memorandum is in Dorsey's handwriting. Dorsey says that he gave the first part of that memorandum to Kellogg.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think he said he might have done it. Give us the page.

Mr. MERRICK. I have not the page. I am speaking now from general recollection.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think he said he might have done it.

Mr. MERRICK. I think probably that is so. I will accept that. Dorsey says he might have given that memorandum to Kellogg. The counsel will not accept that testimony. He says Rerdell manufactured the whole of it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think he did.

Mr. MERRICK. You think he manufactured the whole of it?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do.

Mr. MERRICK. Then Kellogg did not tell the truth?

Mr. INGERSOLL. He was mistaken.

Mr. MERRICK. The counsel got his hand in charging down upon our witnesses, and having got through with them, he is now charging down upon his own. I have no objection to that. He says that Kellogg was mistaken. Kellogg looked at it carefully, examined it minutely, talked about the calculation of interest which he was directed to make upon it. He seemed to have a distinct recollection, and swore with positiveness that he had seen the first part of that paper before.

There were many other things in Mr. Ingersoll's speech which I had made a note of, but, gentlemen, I find that I am speaking so long that I am obliged to eliminate. I have illustrated how Rerdell is corroborated, and I have given from Mr. Ingersoll's argument not such questions as are incidental, but such as relate to the body and material parts of the case.

Before speaking of that memorandum, which I will leave suspended for the present, I call your attention to some few illustrations in the evidence of S. W. Dorsey's bad recollection. It is very proper in this connection, for I am now getting down to that part of my argument where I propose to take these two gentlemen, Dorsey and Rerdell, and put them arm in arm and follow them along together. I will only refer you to a few cases.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Before you go on with that, Mr. Merrick, I think you are mistaken about Kellogg's testimony. At page 3638 he says :

I would not want to say that I have seen this memorandum before, or a part of it at least, but these first three items I remember very distinctly Mr. Dorsey giving me a memorandum of to make on the books, which I made on the books.

Mr. MERRICK. All right; let it go. I do not care how it is, gentlemen; I am willing to take anything that is fair. I have more than enough.

Now, a few illustrations of S. W. Dorsey's memory, which he says is perfectly splendid; not only satisfactory to him, but elegant; to use his own language, gorgeous.

At page 3822: Don't remember whether he signed Peck's name to the proposal dated December 17, 1877, or not. The proof is that he did. Then there are some questions asked him about temporary service.

Page 3824: Contract of Peck's for temporary service from Camp Supply to Fort Bascom exhibited. Don't recollect whether he signed it. Don't recollect either proposal or contract.

Q. Don't you know that you would remember it if you had signed it?—A. I don't know; I don't know anything.

On page 3839:

Q. Did he—

Miner—

come to Washington on his own suggestion or on yours?—A. I think on mine.

Q. When did you make the suggestion?—A. I don't remember.

Q. What is your best recollection?—A. I have no recollection.

Q. What do you think?—A. I don't think.

That is S. W. Dorsey, gentlemen. On page 3840 :

Q. Of course you don't know. Does your memory suffer only an occasional impairment, or is it permanent?—A. It is a pretty fine memory.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Fair memory.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

It is a pretty fair memory; is satisfactory to me.

Page 3842: Don't remember of communicating with Peck; don't remember that Boone told him he would not go in on a salary.

Page 3849: Don't remember what salary was to be paid Boone.

Page 3853: Don't recollect that John W. Dorsey was ever employed at the United States Senate.

Page 3856: Don't recollect whether the proposal and bond and oath sent to Clendenning were filled by Boone under his direction. (See Boone, pages 1508-'9.)

Page 3857: Don't recollect that the name of the bidder was not to be put in. (See Boone, page 1488; the fact being the material fact in the whole transaction.)

Pages 3867-'68: Don't remember giving instructions as to the clause for expedition in the subcontracts. (See Boone, page 1524, where the instructions were not only given, but the covenant was actually written by Dorsey's own hand.)

Page 3867 : Don't remember giving general instructions as to how subcontracts should be prepared. (See Boone, page 1523.)

Page 3868 : Don't recollect of exercising any authority about the business. (See Boone's testimony, pages 1508-'9-'12.) S. W. Dorsey exercised all the authority about the business, regulated the whole concern.

Page 3869 : Don't recollect that Boone submitted a form of subcontract. (See Boone, page 1524, where he not only submitted a form of subcontract, but where Dorsey changed the form by putting in another covenant.)

Page 3872 : Don't remember of writing the second clause for expedition in the subcontracts. (See Boone, page 1525, where he says he copied it in after Dorsey wrote it.)

Page 3875 : Don't remember how many amounts he changed on the bidding-book.

Page 3880 : Don't remember that Boone at any time told him to keep Miner and John W. Dorsey away from here, as they were stupid. (See Boone, page 1531, where he says that they knew nothing of the business; that is about the substance of it.)

Page 3883 : Don't remember whether Boone was to furnish any bondsmen. (See Boone, page 1525, where Boone was to furnish one bond, and did furnish one.)

Page 3886 : Has no recollection of writing John W. Dorsey that Mr. Vaile had "taken the whole business, and is to pay you $10,000 for your interest."

Page 3887 : Don't remember whether he wrote John W. Dorsey more than one letter on December 9, 1878.

Page 3892 : Letter addressed to T. J. Brady, dated March 4, 1879, signed J. W. Dorsey, for John M. Peck and John W. Dorsey, exhibited. Don't remember of signing any such letter.

Page 3895 : Don't remember how the authority to speak for Peck and John W. Dorsey was communicated, whether by letter or power of attorney.

Page 3895 : Don't remember of putting any power of attorney on file in the department.

Page 3895 : Don't remember whether the power of attorney was given before the 4th of March, 1879, or not, whilst he was in the Senate.

Page 3896 : Don't remember giving Boone any instructions as to the number of trips and length of the routes upon which he was preparing bids. (See Boone, pages 1511-12, where Boone says he told him to tear up all bids he had previously made on routes of a different character; that the routes they were to bid for must be long routes and the service once a week.)

Page 3897 : Do not recollect that all bids for service over three times a week were destroyed. (See Boone, page 1512, where he says that all bids for that kind of service were destroyed by S. W. Dorsey's order and direction.)

Page 3910 : Has no recollection of ever seeing A. W. Moore but once. (See Moore's testimony, pages 1355, 1372-'73.) He says he has no recollection of ever seeing A. W. Moore but once. I will show you, gentlemen of the jury, that it was through him that Moore was employed; that he was the first man that ever heard Moore's name mentioned in connection with the business. I will show you that S. W. Dorsey asked Boone for a good man to go to look after the business; that Boone told him he did not want to be responsible for the selection of a man; Dorsey told him to name to him the man; Boone then recommended Moore to S. W. Dorsey, and, without further ado, the next day Mr. Miner went and employed Mr. Moore. Dorsey recollects nothing about it.

Page 3912: Don't remember a conversation with Boone in reference to employment of A. W. Moore. (See Boone, page 1474.)

Page 3912: Don't remember asking Boone to recommend a fit person to go West and attend to this business. (See Boone, page 1474, where he says he did.)

Page 3916: Don't remember of inquiring of Moore about his trip to the West. (See Moore, page 1372)—and bear in mind the circumstance that Moore went West; Dorsey knew he was West; went West to look after this business. Dorsey says in reference to sending Rerdell out, that he was deeply interested in these routes, and yet when Moore came back from the West and came to Dorsey's house and Dorsey paid him $250 on an order, if you please, from Miner, Dorsey says he does not remember ever asking him about those routes. His eye fixed on the West, his heart-strings entangled with a section of these routes; his pocket-strings entangled with a section of these routes, yet, when a man sent out to look after these routes comes back, he gives him $250, and never asks him a word about these routes; don't remember that he ever asked him a word.

The COURT. Is there any evidence that the sureties on these bonds were secured by Mr. Dorsey?

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Boone swears that he procured Mr. Hoyt, and Mr. Dorsey states, I think, that he procured the others. On all the contracts in this indictment the sureties are Mr. D. W. C. Wheeler and Mr. S. N. Hoyt.

The COURT. I had observed that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There are two sets of bonds on all these contracts.

Mr. BLISS. I am talking about the contracts; that is what his honor asked about. On the bids there are various sureties.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think the evidence is that he secured Mr. Evans.

Mr. BLISS. On the bids, not on the contracts.

The COURT. I was thinking of the testimony of S. W. Dorsey in regard to one of the motives that influenced him in looking after the service on these routes, that the sureties which he had procured would become entangled or embarrassed probably by a failure, and that he would be in honor bound to see that the sureties met with no loss, because he had procured them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not want the court to forget another point—that the sureties on the original proposals are bound during the whole contract term for carrying the mail according to the contract that should thereafter be entered into.

The COURT. No.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, yes.

The COURT. The sureties on the proposals are bound only until the contract is executed.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; all the way through. Colonel Ingersoll is right.

The COURT. I certainly had a strong impression the other way.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I know I am right, because I recollect arguing that point.

The COURT. You probably know more about it than I do.

Mr. MERRICK. Page 3916: Don't remember of inquiring of Moore about his trip to the West. (See Moore, page 1372.)

I will pass over some of these "don't remembers." Let us get down to something important in the "don't remembers."

Page 3920: Don't remember procuring passes for Rerdell to go West in 1878; and yet he says in another place he did.

Page 3920: Don't remember whether he gave Rerdell instructions as to building ranches or organizing post-offices on the Tongue River route.

Page 3920: Don't remember giving him any forms of petitions.

Page 3922: Don't recollect whether he told Rerdell the Tongue River route would be increased and expedited; he afterwards says possibly he did.

Page 3923: Do not remember whether he opened the account of J. W. Dorsey & Co. with the German-American Bank or not. Not a member of the firm; gives him $3,000 for that trip, but don't remember whether he opened the account then, or whether it had been opened before; knows nothing about it.

Page 3927: Do not remember having a conversation with Rerdell and showing him a mass of correspondence addressed to J. W. Dorsey, J. R. Miner, and Peck, but cannot say.

Page 3928: Don't remember whether or not Rerdell went up to Miner's office in the third story and worked on those papers, when it is in proof that Rerdell did go there. It is proved by Rerdell and others that he was there working with Miner, and by Rerdell that he went at Dorsey's request. S. W. Dorsey was the only man with whom he had those relations which would justify him in asking him (Rerdell) to go and do that work.

Page 3928: Don't remember whether or not he employed another man as substitute when Rerdell left to go West. And yet it is in proof that he did employ Anderson; that Anderson took Rerdell's place to work on these routes after Dorsey sent Rerdell West, and remained there until Miner came back; and Miner himself says that he found Anderson there taking charge of the business.

Page 3934: Don't remember how many routes he took in the division of April 1, 1879.

Page 3936: At the time of the division don't remember whether a lot of blank affidavits were divided or not. That is a material fact, dividing up the profits of the robbery accomplished during the preceding year, and leaving the tools to carry on the robbery during the years to come, with covenants of mutual aid such as might be required. He did not remember whether they were divided up or not.

Page 3937: Can't say whether or not the oath on 38145, filed April 26, 1879, was originally a blank affidavit. And yet he filed it, and filled it up. He got the benefit of the money fraudulently taken from the Treasury on that oath.

Page 3937: Has no recollection of filling in the blank spaces.

Page 3938: He says he got all he could in the way of increase and expedition; had a contract for that; "that was my business," says he; "and in the way of increase and expedition I got all I could; that is what I had the contract for."

Page 3940: Don't remember of ever having drawn a cent on a mail route in his life.

Page 3945: Don't know whether he instructed Rerdell to fill up the oath on Toquerville to Adairville, though it is possible he did.

Page 3949: Don't remember the exact date that Bosler became interested.

Page 3949: Don't recollect directing that a statement be made out showing the character of these routes, for the purpose of showing to Bosler.

Page 3949: Don't remember that he told Rerdell to show Bosler the books, though it was a natural thing to do.

Page 3950: Don't remember whether the agreement with Bosler was in writing or not.

Page 3951: Don't remember how much money Bosler was to advance after the first advance of $10,000 was made.

Page 3951: Don't remember how long after the first advance the second one was made.

Page 3951: Don't remember at what time Bosler's one-third interest began.

Page 3954: Don't remember whether he was to pay Bosler 1 or 2 per cent. a month on those advances. An interesting fact—he was to pay 1 or 2.

Page 3956: Don't remember whether Rerdell was present in New York or not at the first settlement with Bosler.

Page 3962: Don't remember of buying any account-books in the spring of 1879.

Page 3979: Don't remember whether or not he requested some one to go and see Rerdell on the night of the Albemarle Hotel interview. Note this, gentlemen: He had an interview with Rerdell at the Albemarle Hotel—an interview which left him in peril. Rerdell left him, but he pursued Rerdell on the wings of the lightning with two dispatches to be delivered to him in Philadelphia on his way to Washington; followed him with a letter, but don't remember whether he got anybody that night to go to him or not; came on here to Washington and accidentally met Bosler. But he don't remember whether, on that night when he learned the peril in which he stood, he got anybody to go and see Rerdell.

Page 3981: Does not remember whether Rerdell's affidavit was written before or after he arrived here from New York. Cannot swear anything about it.

Page 3982: Don't remember what steps he took to ascertain the truth.

Page 3985: Don't remember whether or not he prepared any part of that affidavit, although, on his examination-in-chief, he swore he never wrote a word of it from the beginning to the end, to use his own language.

The COURT. What page do you refer to there?

Mr. MERRICK. 3985, and see page 3733, your honor. He was being pressed on that affidavit, shoved into a corner, and when he got in a corner where he thought he could not get out, he said in reply to my question, "Before I answer that I want to consult with my counsel." Not able to stand alone, seeing peril on all sides, he wanted an architect to erect a bridge in order to escape over the precipices with which he was surrounded. I will talk of that more hereafter.

Page 3986: Don't remember whether he wrote the words "Mr. President" in this affidavit or not. He had sworn that he had not written a word when examined in chief. His answers came as responsive as echo comes to sound when his own counsel was examining him. When I examined him, however, answers flew to the right, answers flew to the left, answers flew above, and answers flew below, and everywhere except in direct response to my questions.

Page 3986: Don't remember whether these words were written before or after Colonel Ingersoll was sent for.

Page 3986 : Don't remember whether or not they were written at his direction.

Page 3987 : Can't tell whether the last paragraph of the affidavit was in the original draft of the affidavit.

Page 3987 : Don't remember whether or not the original was intended for the President or the public.

Q. You have not said anything very absolutely. You said you thought so, and you think so yet?—A. Yes, sir. Put Colonel Ingersoll on the stand, and I guess he can tell you about it.

Why did not Colonel Ingersoll take the stand and tell about it when his client could not recollect?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not think it would have been proper for me, as attorney in the case, to take the stand.

The COURT. No; I do not think it would.

Mr. MERRICK. I hardly think it would.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is the reason I did not.

Mr. MERRICK. My rule of professional ethics is rather a harsh one sometimes. When I find my client in an attitude where my testimony can protect and save him, I retire from his case as counsel, and take the stand for him as a witness, if I can do more good as a witness than I can as a lawyer.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not think he needed my testimony.

Mr. MERRICK. That is my rule.

I guess he can tell you all about it.

Q. I would prefer to get it from you.—A. You seem to question my testimony.

Q. No; pardon me. I am not saying that I question your testimony. I am trying to refresh your bad recollection.—A. Oh, my memory is first rate.

Q. First rate?—A. FIRST RATE.

He swears to that. That is part of his testimony. That is said under oath, just like all the rest.

But I will read no more. He has never had but one equal in a court of justice, and his name I do not recollect. He was one of those Italian witnesses, in the case so often referred to, the famous case of Queen Caroline. His frequent and persistent failures of memory were such that he cannot be believed. I say that on the record before this honorable court in this case and upon the testimony S. W. Dorsey has established such a character as to cause him to be disbelieved henceforth, and that whatever may have been his glory heretofore, yet his character is such that he cannot now be believed under oath in a court of justice. Take him along with Rerdell; balance one against the other, the pupil against the master. Take the iniquities perpetrated by the combination of the pupil and the master, and answer, gentlemen of the jury, which will you believe—the man who profited by the iniquity or the man who gained nothing; the man for whom the iniquitous work was done by Rerdell and to whom the price of Rerdell's crime was paid, without one single cent of that price going into Rerdell's pocket, or will you take Rerdell? Dorsey took him and led him along step by step and gradually steeped him in iniquity. He debauched him, and then used the character that he had debauched for the infamous practices that became necessary for his own pecuniary emolument.

The COURT. I am ready to adjourn whenever you are.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not want to tire the jury.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 6, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court and gentlemen of the jury: Yes, Stephen W. Dorsey debauched him and used him for his own criminal purposes. Realizing that the iniquities he had practiced had not been for himself, but for his master; scathed and blistered by the ordeal through which he had passed on account of having faithfully served that master; having been convicted on one trial and his master having escaped a similar fate; feeling the deep injustice of such an unequal fate brought about not by facts and evidence, but by inequality of position and inequality in the possession of those means sometimes used to accomplish results even in the administration of the law, Rerdell determined to seek his safety by throwing himself upon the mercy of the Government and admitting before this jury that he was guilty of the charge made in this indictment, as the jury before which he had been first tried found him to be in their most remarkable verdict.

In what attitude, gentlemen, do these two men now stand before you with regard to their respective claims to be believed and credited, and with regard to the temptations that surround them to tell the truth or to conceal and falsify? Rerdell having pleaded guilty, and then having been put upon the stand by the Government, is in a position where whatever he may hope of response to his appeal for mercy depends upon whether or not he tells on the witness-stand the truth and the whole truth. You remember that he was asked by the counsel for the defendants whether or not he had ever been informed of a case reported in 99 United States, known as the Whisky cases; and he stated that his counsel had informed him of such a case. You remember that in the argument of Mr. Ingersoll a question was brought forward by him as to the temptation held out to Rerdell by the promises contained in that case, as declarations of the law of the land. You remember that the court said in the course of Mr. Ingersoll's comments on the subject that any equitable claim that he might have to the mercy upon which he had thrown himself depended upon his telling the truth, and that Mr. Ingersoll replied he had not told it, and would not be entitled to a favorable response to his petition in that regard. The court construed the case correctly, and I beg leave, in order to illustrate the attitude of these two men and to show the character of the temptation that surround them, to read you a passage or two from that case. On page 603 the Supreme Court of the United States, in speaking of cases where accomplices are introduced as witnesses, uses the following language:

Such offenders everywhere are competent witnesses if they see fit to voluntarily appear and testify; but the course of proceeding in the courts of many of the States is quite different from that just described, the rule being that the court will not advise the Attorney-General how he shall conduct a criminal prosecution. Consequently it is regarded as the province of the public prosecutor, and not of the court, to determine whether or not an accomplice, who is willing to criminate himself and his associates in guilt, shall be called and examined for the State.

* * * * *

Prosecutors in such a case should explain to the accomplice that he is not obliged to criminate himself—

As you remember I explained to Rerdell—and inform him just what he may reasonably expect in case he acts in good faith and testifies fully and fairly as to his own acts in the case and those of his associates.

When he fulfills those conditions he is equitably entitled to a pardon, and the prosecutor, and the court if need be, when fully informed of the facts, will join in such a recommendation.

Further on, at page 605, the court says :

Cases undoubtedly have arisen where the accomplice, having refused to comply with the conditions annexed to his equitable right, has been subsequently tried and convicted, it being first determined that he has forfeited his equitable title to prosecution by his bad faith and false representations. Such offenders, if they make a full disclosure of all matters within their knowledge in favor of the prosecution, will not be subjected to punishment; but if they refuse to testify, or testify falsely, they are to be tried and may be convicted from their own confession.

Therefore, gentlemen of the jury, whatever hope Rerdell may have had of light from the seat of mercy shining upon his dark and unhappy career, was a hope at the time he testified resting in an appreciation of the fact that its realization depended upon his telling the truth upon the stand. The United States Government is not looking for equivocation, a straining of facts, or a manufacture of narratives in order to convict any living man. It is looking for the truth and the truth alone, in order that justice may be done. If an accomplice accepted by the United States as a witness testifies falsely, in whatever direction the falsehood may tend, that accomplice thereby forfeits his right to the expected mercy in hope of which he threw himself upon the court and the country. Rerdell, therefore, had every temptation to tell the truth. Rerdell had every inducement to tell the truth and he told nothing but the truth. He felt that he had been deserted by those whose duty it was to protect him, and as I have said, he felt that he was to be made to bear the whole burden of their criminal acts as well as his own criminal acts done in their behalf and for their benefit. He felt that whilst they were let to go at large unconvicted he had been sent to jail under the verdict of the jury, and he realized that that verdict had been set aside on the suggestion of the counsel for the United States, because it disgraced the records of the court in letting the master go free and limiting retributive justice only to the servant. He felt the inequality of the position so forcibly pressed upon you by Mr. Ingersoll in his address to the jury. He felt that of him no lawyer would say that it was to be remembered "what he was and what he had been;" that of him no lawyer would say the officers of the Administration disgraced the places they held, and to which he helped to elevate them by attacking him. He felt that of him no counsel could challenge court, jury, and the power of the Executive ever to convict him under any possible circumstances. He felt alone bearing the burden of another's sin, suffering the punishment for another's crime, and he threw himself upon the mercy of the court. There was no place on earth where his foot could rest in peace as long as he remained where he was. He had often started in the same direction and been called back by sentiments of friendship for these men and gratitude, as he supposed, to them. But the final hour for parting had come. It was not until the day before he was put on the stand that the Government agreed to accept him. Up to that hour I had peremptorily and positively refused. He sought to show his earnestness and his sincerity in every possible way. I may here say in passing as to the proposition said to have been made by him in reference to the challenges of jurors that I believe such a suggestion was made to Mr. Blackmar, and when communicated to me I repudiated it immediately, and told him not for an instant to entertain it. It never was entertained and never was to be acted upon. As to communications coming to Mr. Blackmar from him during the trial, I believe there never was any word that I have ever heard of or learned at that time or since, after critical inquiry, except as to the handwriting upon papers offered in evidence.

Mr. HENKLE. You have no right to testify at this stage of the case.

Mr. MERRICK. This is a personal matter.

Mr. HENKLE. I know ; but you have no right to speak as you did.

Mr. MERRICK. Have I not the right, when counsel for the defense said that he sat among them without notice and communicated with the Government?

Mr. HENKLE. You have no right to state anything that is not in the testimony.

Mr. MERRICK. Why, then, did Mr. Ingersoll discuss the question? Cannot I reply? Mr. Ingersoll stated that he was with them, and they had no notice. Vaile himself, the client of the gentleman who has interrupted me, when he was on the stand stated that Rerdell had given him notice before he borrowed that money, about which there has been so much false sentiment, flummery, and nonsense. Vaile himself swears he had before that time had several talks with Rerdell upon the subject, and Rerdell told him what spirit was moving within him. John W. Dorsey had notice of his purpose when he wrote the threatening letter to Rerdell, and attempted to intimidate a witness for the Government, as he supposed, by saying that if he went on the stand or did anything to injure the defendants he would have him prosecuted for perjury, and some other unnamed crime. The defendants knew it when the counsel for the defendants, in his opening address to the jury, denounced Rerdell directly or, at least, by implication. The defendants knew it when the counsel for the defendants, in the progress of the case, before Rerdell went on the stand, told the counsel for the Government, in speaking of Rerdell, "Take care of your own witness." They knew it all the time, and they trusted him not. They had cast him out. The master sheltered behind the affidavits he had wrung from him felt secure from anything Rerdell might do or say. He had debauched this man first for his own benefit, and then he had made him swear to certain things for his protection, and having obtained from him the false affidavits he cast him off as a thing of rottenness, although he himself had made him rotten.

On the witness-stand, according to the law I have read to you, and as the judge himself pronounced it, this poor unfortunate had no temptation save to tell the truth. Of the necessity of getting rid of him, and of finally and ultimately crushing him entirely and burying him beneath the weight of the crime of Dorsey and himself, Mr. Ingersoll gives ample proof in spending three whole days in the denunciation of Rerdell. There is a time, gentlemen of the jury, in the life of every man of iniquity when he begins to feel that he must change, when he begins to feel, even for his temporal interest, that past criminality must be avoided in the future, and a different life pursued if he would taste at all one drop of happiness on this earth. But in the strange theology of the defendants there seems no place left for repentance, no place left to repair the wrongs done.

One of the most beautiful poets who has ever written tells of a peri who sat at the gates of Eden disconsolate because it could not obtain entrance. The only way in which an entrance could be obtained was by bringing back to Heaven from this earth that which Heaven most prized of all things that could be found among mortal man. The peri came and sought in every place for the gift it thought dearest to Heaven. It carried up the last sigh of a self-sacrificed life; it carried up the last drop of the patriot's blood, but each offering was rejected. Finally, on a flowery plain near a village, a child was observed at play. When the bell sounded for the hour of prayer the little one knelt down and sent the incense of its heart to Heaven. A man with darkened face, with knit brow and wan countenance, marked with "deeds of blood and crime," stood by and saw that infant's pure offering to the Almighty Father. The past flitted through his mind, and, with tears streaming down his cheeks, he knelt beside that child and prayed. The peric caught up the penitential tears and bore them to the gates of Paradise. Wide open flew the gates. The end was accomplished. The task was done. One penitential tear outweighed all things man could offer to Almighty God.

How stands S. W. Dorsey in his temptations, gentlemen of the jury in comparison with Rerdell? Rerdell must swear to the truth to keep himself out of the penitentiary. Having pleaded guilty, the weight of his sentence or the pardon of the Executive which is to follow that sentence depends upon his telling the truth. How as to Dorsey? Dorsey's testimony is given to keep himself out of the penitentiary. The truth will send him there. He has every temptation to falsify, misrepresent, conceal, and lie. Whilst Rerdell must tell the truth to be protected, Dorsey must lie to be protected. I will show you how in your very faces he did conceal the truth; how in your very faces his counsel advised him to conceal the testimony; how in your very faces testimony in his pocket was concealed when he was on the witness stand, and I called for it, or if not in his pocket, within reach of his hand in his safe at his house. Before I am done with him, if you can believe him, you have an extent of credulity with which men have not been endowed in any other class than that of idiots.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, I come to S. W. Dorsey along with Rerdell, and to formulate the proposition which I propose to adopt as the main one in connection with Dorsey, I will say that I join issue directly with his counsel upon the assertion made by him that S. W. Dorsey had no personal interest in these routes prior to the 1st day of April, 1879, and having so joined issue I propose to show to you from the evidence in the case that S. W. Dorsey conceived and organized this conspiracy; that he was the master spirit guiding its operations throughout the period of its existence, profiting by its iniquities, participating in its crimes, directing its violations of law, and supervising all that was bad and evil in connection with it. Let us recur a little to what I may have said in order to prove these propositions. I shall pursue the facts systematically, diverging as I pass along only for the purpose of strengthening by corroboration the evidence that may lie in the direct path. Whatever helps that evidence I shall sweep into the direct path as I progress.

The first we learn of any connection of these parties with these routes is from some statement of John W. Dorsey that he and Peck talked the matter over in New York some time in the summer of 1877. John W. Dorsey, who had never heard of a mail route before, and Peck, who, according to S. W. Dorsey, had been a large contractor, but without a contract, and upon whom consumption was making that deep impression, even at that time, which told him that the end could not be far distant, had conversations on the subject. These conversations were merely speculative interviews in New York about what they might or might not do. In the fall of 1877 they visited Ohio, and there met with S. W. Dorsey, and with him they talked the matter over. Dorsey said that he told them not to go in; that they would endanger his reputation; that he was in the Senate. Here at the very start begins the falsehood and the equivocation. He was in the Senate, and if his brother and his brother-in-law entered upon this enterprise their relations to it and to him would more or less compromise him in his high official position. He says, however, they seemed desirous to go in, and were pretty well determined, and although he had urged them not to go in for their own sakes, because it was a perilous undertaking, and not to go in for his sake, because there was danger that their action would peril his character, he immediately turned around and said, "I will help you all I can. Don't you do it; it will ruin you. Don't you do it; it will ruin me. But if you want to do it, in the name of Heaven go ahead, and I will furnish the money and I will run the machine." Is not that so? How does he reconcile those two inconsistent opinions? Is there any ordinary man that can reconcile them? Not one on the face of the earth. Next, what follows? "I think, gentlemen, if you are going into this business you had better have with you some competent man." "Whom shall we take? What do you say about it?" They did not know Miner then. Unfortunately for them they became acquainted with him afterwards. S. W. Dorsey did know him. Says he, "There is a man by the name of John R. Miner, who is the fellow you ought to have." He suggested Miner. S. W. Dorsey then came on to Washington. What do we next hear of him? He is in the Post-Office Department, and there he meets with a man by the name of A. E. Boone, who had at one time been connected officially with that department, and subsequently had been himself a mail contractor, having eleven hundred routes, but never having had one expedited in his life, or thought of such a thing. He said to Boone, "Now, Boone, I want you to come up to my house to-night. I have got something I want to talk to you about." Boone comes up, and S. W. Dorsey shows Boone a letter from either Peck or John W. Dorsey, he don't know which, asking him to arrange this business here in Washington, or something to that effect, and to get a man to help him. Dorsey then tells Boone that his brother and his brother-in-law had determined to go into this business. This is the fall of 1877. Said Dorsey, "They are going in with John R. Miner, of Sandusky, or some other friend of mine, and I want to make all the necessary arrangements throughout this business. What will you do about it?" "Well, I will undertake it for you." "Will you undertake it at a salary?" "No, I want an interest." And Boone says that it was then and there agreed between him and S. W. Dorsey that he (Boone) should have an interest. Boone's testimony will be found at page 1477, but I will not pause to read it, for I must hurry along as rapidly as I can. You will remember it; and you will remember that S. W. Dorsey, whilst at one time giving it an emphatic contradiction, at another time partially acquiesces in it, and says in another part of his testimony that Boone's evidence is much more reliable than his. Boone went to work under S. W. Dorsey and sent out circulars to the far West to get information about these routes, in order to bid intelligently. When he had got his information, he alone, or he with Miner, took the books of advertisement and marked opposite the routes what they would bid for each respective route. Having done that, this Senator of the United States, S. W. Dorsey, who had no interest in the routes at all, and who had advised his brother and brother-in-law not to go into the speculation, takes the bidding-book and reduces the prices at which the routes were proposed to be taken by Boone and Miner. That he reduced the prices on two routes is admitted, and Boone swears that all of them were altered, and Boone says that Miner told him that he was not responsible for the low figures, and intended to keep the book as his (Miner's) justification. The master hand of Dorsey, the head-center of the conspiracy, had altered the bids; and Miner, knowing that Boone knew better than Dorsey their prospective losses by the low prices fixed upon the routes, declared that he intended to keep the book to show that he was not to blame for the danger that was to come to the conspiracy under those circumstances. When the bidding-book had been completed, and the bids were about to be put in, surely then you would think that a man who had nothing to do with it, but was only lending money to help his brother and brother-in-law, would stand to one side and leave the man he had employed, as the man most efficient, to run the thing without his help. But that was not the case. Boone certified to the presence of Peck when the bids were acknowledged, but he now swears that that certificate was not true, and that Peck never appeared before him to acknowledge a single bid. The certificate is dated as of Washington, and says that Peck appeared here before Boone. Boone says that is not so. S. W. Dorsey tells you that Peck was never in this city after 1876, I think.

What does S. W. Dorsey do now with reference to those proposals? S. W. Dorsey signs Peck's name himself, not by direction of Peck, not as Peck's attorney, but he forges the name of Peck and palms it off on the United States as Peck's genuine signature. (See proposal 5, Canyon City to Camp McDermitt; proposal 2, Eugene City to Bridge Creek; proposal 2 L, Dalles to Baker City; proposal 2 P, Julian to Colton.) There is the record of this man who had no interest in the routes and advised his brother and brother-in-law not to take them because their intermeddling with a public transaction might compromise his character in his high official position.

What next? There must be bonds on these proposals. S. W. Dorsey writes to Clendenning to prepare the bonds, and asks Clendenning to fill up one of those blanks, which was filled up in the specimen sent him. What was left blank? The place where the bidder's name should be was left blank. The bidder's name was not to appear, and that bond filled up without the bidder's name was good for nothing, under the law, and for a postmaster to certify to its due execution was a criminal act by statute of the United States. Yet this Senator Dorsey asks Clendenning to certify that a bond was filled up according to law, when he (Dorsey) knew that the certificate would be a lie and subject Clendenning to condign punishment under the statutes of the United States. Clendenning wrote him back a firm but positive letter, refusing to execute the Senatorial mandate, although he held a postmastership in the State of Arkansas almost entirely at the Senatorial bidding, Dorsey being Senator from Arkansas.

But before that, and before the signing of these bids, there was something else that occurred that was very extraordinary. Boone, when he had prepared the bids, exhibited the bids thus prepared to S. W. Dorsey, and what did S. W. Dorsey do? Do you remember, Mr. Foreman? Do you recall it? Have you the testimony about that in your minds, gentlemen? Do you recollect, Mr. Horigan, what he did when Boone showed him those bids? He said, "Take the bids and burn them, every one that is made upon a route where there is more than one trip a week, or where there is fast time." He wanted one trip a week, long routes, and slow time. Why? The prospective profit was in expedition. "Bid low; I have cut down your bids; we will take the routes at a low rate and lose, but all we lose to-day upon the original contract will be paid back four-fold to-morrow, when our good affidavit-makers come to the front and put in their false affidavits for expedition. Give me routes, therefore, that are open to these speculative enterprises and open to the practicing of these frauds. Burn them, burn up your bids, where the routes are short, the time fast, or the trips numerous." And Boone says, "I did accordingly burn them up, obeyed his direction, and put the bids in on long routes, where there were few trips and the time was slow."

What else does this gentleman that wants to keep in the background do? "Boone, prepare me a subcontract," says he. Boone says, "I will do it." Boone was told to put in a clause providing for expedition pay. Boone put it in and read it to Dorsey. Dorsey then, with his own hand, wrote another covenant to be substituted for the covenant that Boone had put in. What says Boone about that? "This is an extraordinary covenant; I never knew a contract in my life to have this sort of a covenant in it." The act of 1878 had not passed then, authorizing the filing of subcontracts, and did not pass for some months afterwards. But no doubt Mr. Dorsey may have known it was coming. At least he knew the prospective revolution in the custom of the department to be achieved by Brady in that year, all of which I have shown to you; and Brady may have had Dorsey himself, and doubtless did have him, as one of his auxiliaries in that very revolution. But Dorsey tells Boone, "That covenant won't do; take this which I wrote with my own hand;" and Boone took it and put it in, and I identified the contract in which he had put it, when offered to him, as a contract made with Major by Moore, on the route from Redding to Alturas. It was one of the contracts that Dorsey gave to Moore when he sent him out to make subcontracts, as I will show you when I come to it. That was the paper we handed to Boone to identify. The defendants' counsel may not have seen how far and how widely that paper operated, for it operated to confirm Boone, operated to confirm Moore, and operated to bring Moore close into the bosom of S. W. Dorsey.

The employment of Moore by S. W. Dorsey is another fact showing S. W. Dorsey's participation in this business. In that connection, since it is contended that Moore was employed independently of S. W. Dorsey, and by Miner, let me read to you a little of what Boone says on that subject, on page 1474:

Q. State the conversation.

With S. W. Dorsey.

A. It turned upon the question of somebody going West to sublet these contracts awarded to John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, and John M. Peck in the Western States, and whether I knew of a reliable person who could be sent West; one who could be trusted and relied upon. I said, "Yes, I do. I have ten traveling men in the field, and have had ten for the last year, and out of them you can make your selection." I told him I would prefer to have them select their own man, as if there was any mishap or anything to take exception to they would have nobody to blame but themselves. In that conversation I recommended Mr. Moore as being the most reliable of the ten agents we had in the field.

Q. When was the next conversation you had with either one of the defendants upon the subject of those contracts in connection with Mr. Moore, and with which one?—

A. I don't know whether there might have been some conversation had with Mr. Miner in reference to it before he had seen Mr. Moore; but anyway Mr. Miner called at the office of the company, of which I was secretary and active manager, to see Mr. Moore the next day.

And he made his contract with Mr. Moore. S. W. Dorsey is looking for a man to send West. S. W. Dorsey requests Boone to give him the name of a trustworthy man to perform the offices he wanted performed out West. Boone gives S. W. Dorsey the name of Moore, and Miner, on the next day, goes and employs him. Was not that done at S. W. Dorsey's suggestion?

But what more? I will not follow Moore all the way down, gentlemen; I must eliminate. I have eliminated a great deal, and I must eliminate a great deal more. What else was done? Moore goes out to the West to perform the duty which he had been employed to perform. He comes back by way of Denver, and there sees Miner, and has a conversation with Miner, to which I will refer. He returns here, and Dorsey pays him $250 on a demand from Miner which Miner had given to Moore at Denver. Some days afterwards Moore receives one hundred and sixty-odd dollars from Miner, and they say that this receipt for one hundred and sixty-odd dollars specifies that it is in full for services, including the $250 already received. That receipt, bear in mind, was to Miner. Moore signed it. Moore says it was a receipt for money paid for hotel bills and for telegraphing between the time he got the $250 from S. W. Dorsey and the date when the money was paid, and he shows you conclusively that he did telegraph and correspond with a postmistress on The Dalles and Baker City route. If we are to take that receipt as expressive on its face of the entire and incontrovertible truth, what does it lead us to? The receipt bears the caption of Denver, not Washington City. But the money was paid here, and all the parties admit that all the money was paid here. It has a printed heading of Denver, Colorado.

What else is there in this connection that is confirmatory of Moore, gentlemen of the jury? When Moore left here it was agreed that his pay should be sent to his wife in Chicago; the money was not sent; the wife writes to Boone. What does Boone do? He mentions it to Miner. "Oh," says Miner, "go to Stephen W. Dorsey about it." He goes to Stephen W. Dorsey, and tells him that the contract under which Moore was employed required the money to be sent to his wife; that he has a letter from her in which she says that she has not received it; what is to be done? Dorsey says, "I will send it," and he sat down at once and wrote the check and sent it. He admits that he wrote the check and sent it to this woman out West, in response to her letter.

Here is that original receipt, gentlemen, which I referred to a moment ago. It has a printed heading of Denver, Colorado. Like the Chico letter, which had the printed date of 1878, and Dorsey forgot to alter the date to 1879, for it was written in 1879, and not in 1878. That is all the answer to the Chico letter. This receipt is dated Denver, Colorado, July 24.

Mr. CARPENTER. Your witness swore that it was not written in 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. I say the letter was written in 1879, and I will show it when I come to it. If I make an incorrect statement, the counsel can correct me, but not by introducing other matter.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is the only proof in the case, and he says it was in 1878.

Mr. MERRICK. Is that right, your honor?

The COURT. He is asserting that the evidence is different from what you have stated it to be.

Mr. MERRICK. I have stated one thing, and he states another.

The COURT. You can meet that when you come to it, though.

Mr. MERRICK. Again, to confirm Moore, Dorsey in his conversation with Moore, tells him the reason for wanting long routes with few trips and slow time—because the money was in the increase and expedition. He tells Moore in the spring of 1878 precisely what he had told Boone when the bids were being prepared; and that this was the fact of the transaction is shown in a previous part of my argument, in which I have demonstrated how they turned losing into gaining routes.

He tells Moore that 40 per cent. of the expedition is a good contract for the subcontractor. Moore's subcontract with Major, which Boone identifies as in the form he had prepared at Dorsey's bidding, was made for 40 per cent. exactly, in obedience to Dorsey's instructions. S. W. Dorsey instructs Moore to assure subcontractors that the service would be increased and expedited. S. W. Dorsey denies this. Dorsey instructs Moore to assure the subcontractors that the service would be increased and expedited. Dorsey swears that he never had three words of conversation with Moore. Now, what is the proof?

Major says, at pages 1438 and 1442, that Moore told him that there would be increases and expedition, and that he was authorized to make that statement by Senator Dorsey. Did Moore lie to Major at that time? Why should he have done so? It is admitted that he was there as the representative of an interest in the routes, and the only question at issue is whether he was there as the representative of S. W. Dorsey, and whether S. W. Dorsey was interested in the routes. If Dorsey at that time had not authorized him to make this representation, why should he have made it? Testimony of what occurred at the time is better than recollection now of what may have passed in conversation then, and especially better than the recollection of a man who, on some sixty-odd important inquiries in reference to the material and substance of the case, which any man would have recollected, answered the counsel for the Government that he "don't recollect," while in response to his own counsel in his examination-in-chief his memory was bright and accurate enough.

At page 1368 Moore sublets the Redding and Alturas route to Major, and tells Major that there would be one additional trip before July 1. Bear in mind, gentlemen, that we are now coming to some of the prophecies, the realization of which in precise accuracy exceed the wonderful realization of the prophecies of those who claim to be and were inspired. Let us see. He tells Major that there would be one additional trip before July 1, and a daily mail and expedition as soon as he will send on the petition.

Major, at page 1442, testifies that, as represented by Moore, one trip was added before July 1, then three trips and expedition, and then another trip. Why, you could not with greater accuracy prophesy the time of the rising and setting of the sun, or foretell more surely the circuit he will perform to-morrow. Here is vision reaching into the future, and the realization of that prophetic vision and of the hopes and expectations bodied forth in that prophetic vision, coming to actual fruition within the time he said it would. How could Moore have conceived such ideas in his own head? He knew nothing of the matter except what he learned from Dorsey. At page 1433 Major says:

Q. You did not want it—

That is, the contract—at the price it was given by the Government?—A. No, sir; I did not want it. I stated to him—that I did not think it would pay horse-feed—

Moore—

That is, at what the Government had let it—

I did not want it at all. He went on to tell me that he could get the trips increased, and I asked him what assurance he had for that. He then pulled out a power of attorney and read it to me, signed by Miner, Peck, and Dorsey, and said that that was his assurance that he could do this. He furthermore said that Senator Dorsey was the ringleader.

Then occurs some discussion about it.

Q. Who else?—A. Senator Dorsey. He said he was the ringleader of the institution. Mr. MERRICK. Never mind that.

That was thrown out, and Major goes on to say that he only took this contract at the price at which the Government had let it, which would not pay horse-feed, upon Moore's assurances of increase and expedition, and in the hope that thereby in some way it would be made a profitable contract.

Moore tells McBean out there at the same time, I believe, that they can get the increase and expedition on the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route. That was his second visit; he went out a second time. He said that the increase and expedition which they would get would run the service up to $50,000. See how accurate he was, gentlemen of the jury, about the future of that service. The record evidence shows that the total pay on this route, after increase and expedition, was $50,166.66. He only missed the exact figures of his prophecy of $50,000 by $166.66. Don't you think they had figured it up pretty well, gentlemen, to understand it so thoroughly?

McBean testifies, at page 1611, that Moore represented to him that the service would be increased and afterwards expedited. But he was wrong, for they both came together, not one following the other.

Moore says, at page 1362, that S. W. Dorsey gave him letters and passes. Dorsey says that he never had three words of conversation with Moore, you recollect.

Major says, at page 1439, that Moore showed him passes, including an annual pass for John W. Dorsey. You know from the testimony that S. W. Dorsey had these passes. You know that, from his position and the relation he sustained to the railroad companies in the West, he was the only one of these defendants who could get these passes. You know that he admitted that he gave Rerdell passes, and that he gave his other agents passes, but he denies that he had any conversation with Moore; and yet Moore is in possession of the same passes which S. W. Dorsey admits he gave to his other agents when he sent them to the West. Moore's statement in reference to the passes is confirmed by Major, who says that Moore exhibited to him the passes. Who lied, Moore or S. W. Dorsey? You must not forget who S. W. Dorsey was, nor cease to recollect what he is!!!

Miner tells Moore, at page 1372, that there may be a loss on the service in Eastern Oregon, but expedition would leave a profit; Moore replies that the more increase there was and the more expedition, the worse off they would be,—a fact in such transactions as I have explained to you so distinctly that you cannot fail to understand it; and I am sure you recollect it, for a losing contract could never be turned into a gaining one, and the loss would continue to be greater on each expedition.

The COURT. That would depend on the affidavit.

Mr. MERRICK. Of course it would. I mean if the order of expedition is made strictly under the law. The proposition with which I started in this case, gentlemen, rises in our path at every step to assert itself and avow its truth, and will continue to do so until we go through this argument to the end, and it will go with you to the jury-room, and if you appreciate the facts and act within your solemn obligations—as I know you will—it will speak, in your verdict of guilty, as the largest and most important element that led your judgments to that conclusion.

What does Miner say now confirming what I have said to you about this matter of expedition which his honor says depends on the affidavit?

Miner tells Moore that expedition depended upon the oath of the contractors, and that they were "all good affidavit men." Expedition lose? Oh, no, Mr. Moore, you should recollect that though losing it may be, under the law, and though the proportions cannot be changed, and the preservation of the proportion is the rule that must regulate the increased compensation under the law, "that practically expedition depends on the affidavit, and we are all good affidavit men."

Mr. BLISS. And he says they proposed to make a good thing out of it.

Mr. MERRICK. Read it.

Mr. BLISS. [Reading from page 1372:]

And they proposed to make a pretty good thing out of it.

Mr. MERRICK. How could that have escaped me? Probably it was merely for the purpose of having Brother Bliss emphasize it by reading to you. I must have left it out purposely.

THEY WERE ALL GOOD AFFIDAVIT MEN, AND THEY PROPOSED TO MAKE A PRETTY GOOD THING OUT OF IT.

Moore says, at page 1372, that S. W. Dorsey asked him to telegraph to Baker City and make new service to The Dalles and find out if the service had started.

I think I will dispense with any further reading of Mr. Moore's testimony. I have corroborated him enough, and I think he can stand alone as against Mr. Non Mi Ricordo S. W. Dorsey and the acrobatic Miner combined.

Another circumstance illustrating Dorsey's connection with these routes in 1878, and which he now admits, is this: Boone being one of the copartners of J. W. Dorsey & Co., and having charge of this whole matter in 1878, but being doomed or destined to be turned out, has possession of all the papers. Miner is not here. Peck, of course, never was here. John W. Dorsey is out on Tongue River, and Boone is left, the sole representative, to manipulate and manage these routes. Now, what does S. W. Dorsey do? He says, "Rerdell, go down to Boone's and get those pigeon holes and those papers and bring them here to me." Rerdell, in obedience to that command, went down to Boone's house and got the case and the papers in the case and brought them to S. W. Dorsey's house; took from Boone every record in the matter which he had in charge, and for the management of which he was then the only man in Washington City, Miner being away, Peck being in New Mexico taking care of his physical health, and John W. Dorsey being out West putting the service on Tongue River. Now, S. W. Dorsey says it was because Miner was coming back. But Miner had not come. Why, if he had no interest in the matter himself, did he not wait until Miner came and let Miner dissolve Boone's connection with the papers as well as with the conspiracy? No. He does not wait for Miner. He acts himself, acts through his own man, Rerdell, a man who was used by him wherever any infamous thing was to be done, or wherever anything was to be done in which S. W. Dorsey desired that his hand might not be seen. Rerdell goes and gets the papers. Immediately after, Rerdell is sent out West by Dorsey. Do you remember when he gave him that $3,000, deposited to the credit of John W. Dorsey & Co., and authorized him to draw on the firm account? That was the time, immediately after those papers came; and up to the time that he went West, Rerdell managed the business there in S. W. Dorsey's house, and when Rerdell went away, what became of the business, Miner not having then arrived? Why, S. W. Dorsey employed Anderson to do the business and put him in charge of the papers that were up in the third story of his house, in Miner's office, and when Miner came here he found Anderson working in the employ of S. W. Dorsey upon those routes. And yet we are told that S. W. Dorsey had nothing to do with these routes.

Allow me, gentlemen of the jury, in this connection to call your attention very briefly to S. W. Dorsey's connection with one particular route. I shall do it very briefly, although I could occupy a good many minutes. At page 1100 Anthony Joseph, subcontractor on the Ojo Caliente route, says that in the month of December, 1878, he received a letter from S. W. Dorsey to put service on the route on the 1st of January, 1879. That is his testimony. Subsequently, on the following Tuesday after that testimony, he corrects his statement, and says that the letter was from John W. Dorsey; that he has come to that conclusion by refreshing his recollection from a letter written on January 15 to John W. Dorsey, and one to S. W. Dorsey on January 20. His correction admits that he was in direct communication upon that subject with S. W. Dorsey. Even if the letter of December was not written by S. W. Dorsey, yet from Mr. Joseph's correction made on the following Tuesday it is evident that he was in direct communication with S. W. Dorsey upon the subject, because he says that his recollection was refreshed from letters written on January 15 to John W. Dorsey and one to S. W. Dorsey on the 20th of the same month. The letter of January 20, 1879, above referred to, I now propose to analyze and see whether Stephen W. Dorsey did not write it, and whether he was not regulating the service on that Ojo Caliente route:

I hereby beg leave to inform you that in compliance with the letter of advice from Mr. John R. Miner, written at your request, I have put stock on the mail route No. 38145, from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City, of which your brother is contractor. [Page 1122.]

Miner wrote him a letter, in which letter Miner tells him it was written at the request of Stephen W. Dorsey, asking him to put service on that route, and he replies, saying that "in obedience to that request in a letter written by Miner I have put stock on this route." Whether Joseph had a letter from John W. Dorsey or not, it is conclusive that Miner wrote this letter at S. W. Dorsey's request.

There is also a letter from Joseph, dated January 15, addressed to John W. Dorsey in Washington, and there is another letter from Joseph, and it is a singular circumstance, that in a letter which he first said he received from S. W. Dorsey, but which he now says was from John W. Dorsey, there should be a statement that John W. Dorsey was sick or absent at the time, if S. W. Dorsey had not himself in fact written the letter. Now, in that letter, which he says originally was from S. W. Dorsey, and subsequently says was from John W. Dorsey, is this statement:

I write this letter because John is sick or absent.

If S. W. Dorsey did not write that letter, such an expression in the letter is certainly a most remarkable circumstance. S. W. Dorsey had manifested before that time, and as far back as June 10, 1878, his great interest in this route by a letter of that date to Brady (page 1079). June 10, 1878, S. W. Dorsey writes to Brady in reference to this very route, in which he explains certain conditions around and about the route and routes contiguous thereto, and suggests that the route be continued and expedited and increased, manifesting his interest in the route as far back as that date. With these suggestions I will dismiss the subject.

And now I come to one of the most important features of this case, the relations of S. W. Dorsey with these transactions prior to the 1st day of April, 1879. I now ask your patient attention, gentlemen of the jury, to the evidence on this subject. I will discuss it calmly and as briefly as I can, and I will sustain my proposition by the evidence, and I do not believe that there is one of you who, when I am through with it, will have a shadow of a doubt upon your mind as to the fact that, prior to April, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey was interested with these men in their conspiracy, and a joint owner of these routes with them. When I have established that fact to your satisfaction, gentlemen, that is the end of this case. It seems that Rerdell had some relations with Miner and Vaile in the fall of 1878 or the following winter, and not being able to settle the pecuniary liabilities arising out of those relations amicably and among themselves, on the 29th day of May, 1879, Rerdell institutes a suit against Vaile and Miner, partners doing business under the firm-name of Vaile, Miner & Co. In order that you may fully understand this I will even go so far as to read his declaration filed in that suit, and which will be found at page 2244:

The plaintiff sues the defendants for that defendants, partners under the firm-name of Vaile, Miner & Co., engaged in the business of carrying the United States mails and operating stage lines in certain of the Western States and Territories, employed plaintiff to assist them in their business at a yearly salary of $1,000, payable quarterly. Under such contract plaintiff commenced work for defendants December 1, 1878, and continued in their service and employ to the 1st day of April, 1879.

From the 1st of December, 1878, to April 1, 1879.

Plaintiff had demanded payment of the amount due him April 1, 1879, to wit \$333 $\frac{1}{3}$, but they did not, nor did either of them, pay the same.

And the plaintiff therefore brings this suit. Now that declaration was accompanied by an affidavit. You are all familiar with this class of suits and the rule in reference to an affidavit accompanying the demand of the plaintiff:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
County of Washington, ss :

Montfort C. Rerdell, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is the plaintiff named in the foregoing declaration; that the said firm of Vaile, Miner & Co. was, on December 1, 1878, composed of H. M. Vaile and John R. Miner, and has continued so composed to the present time, and none other, as he is informed and believes; that defendants are engaged in carrying the United States mails and operating stage lines in certain Western States and Territories; that defendants, both of them being present, employed plaintiff to assist them in their business, and promised to pay him the sum of \$1,000 per year, payable quarterly; that under such employment plaintiff commenced work for defendants December 1, 1878, and continued to work for them until April 1, 1879, performing such services as he was called upon to perform; that no portion of the sum due him for his said services, to wit, \$333 $\frac{1}{3}$, has been paid, and that there is due the plaintiff from the defendants, and he has a just right to recover against the defendants, exclusive of all set-offs and just grounds of defense, the sum of \$333 $\frac{1}{3}$, with interest and costs, as claimed in said declaration.

MONTFORT C. RERDELL.

By R. J. MEIGS, JR.,
Assistant Clerk.

Now, what follows, gentlemen of the jury? Here is their plea:

In the supreme court of the District of Columbia, June 24, 1879.

MONTFORT C. RERDELL	}	Law No. 20823.
vs.
H. M. VAILE AND JOHN R. MINER.

The defendants Vaile and Miner for pleas, say:
1st. They are not indebted as alleged.

2d. That they did not promise as alleged.

And for a third plea these defendants say that said plaintiff was at the time of the commencement of this suit and still is indebted to the defendants in the sum of two hundred dollars (a bill of particulars hereto annexed), with interest from May 1, 1879.

L. G. HINE,

Attorney for Defendants Vaile and Miner.

Now comes a remarkable paper, the bill of particulars :

Montfort C. Rerdell to Vaile, Miner & Co.

May 1, 1879. To cash paid C. T. Perkins at your request..... $200 00

The defendants Vaile and Miner, each speaking for himself, on oath, say that they are not indebted to the plaintiff on any account whatever; that they never had any business transactions with him of any kind or nature; that true it is the defendants Vaile and Miner, with one Stephen W. Dorsey, at one time employed him for a short time to aid in certain mail routes, but say that he was fully paid for his said services; that they not only paid him the full amount he claimed to the time he discontinued his services, but, at his request, paid Charles T. Perkins two hundred dollars on his account, and said plaintiff is indebted to them in said sum, with interest thereon from the 1st day of May, 1879, exclusive of all off-sets and just grounds of defense.

H. M. VAILE.

JNO. R. MINER.

What follows :

Personally appeared before me this 24th day of June, 1879, H. M. Vaile, and made oath that the foregoing statement by him subscribed is true.

CHARLES W. WALTER,

Justice of the Peace.

And next :

Personally appeared before me, this 27th day of June, 1879, John R. Miner, and made oath that the foregoing statement, by him subscribed, is true.

C. S. BUNDY, J. P. [SEAL.]

What do you think of that, gentlemen of the jury? What do Vaile and Miner there swear to? They there swear that Vaile and Miner, with one Stephen W. Dorsey, employed Rerdell; that is, that the firm was Vaile and Miner, and Stephen W. Dorsey. Will you believe these men, as they swore then, in 1879, before the hot breeze of dire necessity had so parched their brain that recollection failed, or will you believe them now in the midst of the disasters of their failing memory and their struggle to get before this jury something that will hold them back from the doors of the penitentiary? They now come into court and swear that Stephen W. Dorsey was not a member of that conspiracy and had no interest in those routes, and that the only members of the firm were Vaile and Miner. In 1879 they came into court and swore, in a suit brought against Vaile and Miner, as the sole members of the firm, that Stephen W. Dorsey had helped to make the contract, and had, together with Vaile and Miner, employed the plaintiff from the 1st of December, 1878, to the 1st of April, 1879, when, according to the theory of the defense, S. W. Dorsey's interest never commenced until the 1st of April, when the routes were divided. According to Mr. Ingersoll's declaration, he had not a particle of interest prior to that time. Yet on a contract where the work was to be done between the 1st of December, 1878, and the 1st of April, 1879, Vaile and Miner come into court and swear, in 1879, with freshness of recollection, that Stephen W. Dorsey was liable with them for that employment for services to be done in mail matters by Rerdell between the 1st of December and the 1st of April. Will you take the Vaile and Miner when, without apprehension of peril to themselves, without temptation to falsehood further than a few dollars could be a temptation, they were swearing in a court of justice? Or will you take the Vaile and Miner pursued by the law, seeking to visit upon them retributive justice, frightened from their propriety it may be, struggling in the hope of getting free from the penalty their crimes deserved, and showing by their testimony that their memories have failed? Which Vaile and Miner will you take—the Vaile and Miner swearing in 1879, or the Vaile and Miner swearing here in 1883? You cannot take them both, for they stand as four men—the Vailes and Miners of 1879 and the Vailes and Miners of 1883 looking each other full in the face; the Vaile of to-day gives the lie to the Vaile of 1879, and the Miner of to-day gives the lie to the Miner of 1879.

Let us go a little further and see in the development of the proceedings of 1879 whether there are any particulars that would give us greater justification and inducement for taking the men of that period rather than for taking the men of the present period. I have read their oath. That ought to be enough. Let us go a little further. On the 29th day of May, 1879, the day the suit was brought, H. M. Vaile wrote a letter. Now, gentlemen, do not let your amazement disturb you, but through your amazement listen to it patiently. It is found on page 2246:

[National Hotel, F. Tenny & Co., Proprietors.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 29, 1879.

S. W. DORSEY, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: Rerdell has to-day sued us, "Vaile, Miner, & Co.," though alleging the firm to be only "Vaile & Miner," for what he claims wages.

Though alleging the firm to be only Vaile and Miner. Rerdell was not going to bring Dorsey in. He was in Dorsey's employ, you recollect, keeping the books.

He certainly has not properly considered this action of his, as you will readily see. If it goes on it will expose, to an extent, our private matters in which you are interested. It will draw forth—

What? It will draw forth—

WHO ARE THE REAL PARTIES OF "VAILE, MINER & CO.," AND IT CANNOT BE HELPED. In view of all the facts in the case he cannot recover anything, and will draw himself into serious difficulties. It seems to me you had better advise him to dismiss his action at once, as we must answer in twenty days. I do not suggest this, fearing that he could ever get a judgment against us, for he cannot, but to save the poor fellow himself from trouble.

There was Vaile's big heart.

He was in the employ of the District government at the time he claims to have been in our employ, and this may involve him in trouble. A man cannot serve two masters at one and the same time. He has wronged one.

He claims pay for four months, $333.33. Your own judgment will suggest many embarrassments evidently not occurring to him. I have deemed it my duty to notify you of his action before answering the complaint, and unless it is dismissed I must answer inside of twenty days.

Trusting you may see this as I do,

Yours, very truly,

H. M. VAILE.

P. S.—I will delay answering as long as I can.

Gentlemen, is not that conclusive testimony, if H. M. Vaile can be believed as to what he said in 1879? Mr. Ingersoll asks the jury how was it if Dorsey was engaged in these transactions that when they were quarreling Vaile did not threaten Dorsey? Why did he not threaten Dorsey? Dorsey being in the Senate a threat from Vaile would have scared him. He did threaten Dorsey. What private griefs they had, alas, we know not. Prior to April, 1879, we know not what private conversations may have occurred. It is more than likely that Vaile did threaten Dorsey, and that Dorsey said, "Do your worst. I am a Senator, but you are a conspirator with me. We are united in fraud. Move if you dare. I will pull down the pillars and let the roof of the temple crush us both." That would have been a wild proposition. Vaile signs this letter in a way that you sign letters written to your intimate friends; not "yours, &c.," as upon a matter of business; not "yours, truly," but, "yours, very truly." It was the language of friendship, the language of intimacy, the language of pleasantness. In that letter so signed he says:

If this suit goes on it will expose to an extent our private matters in which you are interested.

What private matters in which Dorsey was interested? Were there any other matters between him and Vaile except mail matters? It has been shown to you here that they came together at a certain time in October, afterwards entered into these contracts and quarreled in December, then parted to meet again on the 4th of March to separate forever. They had no private matters but the mail transactions. Has anything come out from either of them under the searching cross-examinations to which we have subjected them that is remarkable in reference to those private matters? We have tried to get at all their private matters in connection with the mail, but we have got at no private matters that justified this expression:

If this suit goes on it will expose to an extent our private matters in which you are interested.

There were then private matters connected with the mail, or private matters which we have not learned on this trial, private matters that he threatened Dorsey would be exposed if this suit went on. "Stop the suit or our private matters in which you are interested will be exposed." Then there were private matters connected with the mail, the exposure of which Dorsey had reason to fear. Vaile knew that he feared exposure. What is the next sentence of the letter?

It will draw forth who are the real parties of Vaile, Miner & Co.

"Rerdell has sued Vaile and Miner as the members of the firm. He has sued Vaile and Miner as constituting the entire firm. That is not so. That is not the fact. If this case goes on, bear in mind that it will draw forth who are the real members of that firm." What did that mean when addressed to S. W. Dorsey but this: "You are a member of that firm. Over your iniquities I have allowed the veil to remain where you wished it left. I have let no man lift that veil to peep under and see what was there. I have let that veil remain over your crimes, and your associations with me because it was so desired, but now if this suit goes on that veil will be removed, and the fact will be exposed to the world that you whilst in the Senate of the United States were in a conspiracy with me and Miner to defraud the Government which you were put in office to protect. Beware S. W. Dorsey!" Concealment cannot live in the testimony of this case. Facts must come out.

Again I say, as I said yesterday, quoting from Mr. Ingersoll: A lie will fit nowhere. A truth is in harmony with every truth and makes uniform consistency throughout the world. What truth fits with this statement of Vaile's? The simple, naked, unadorned truth developed by the whole testimony in the case that S. W. Dorsey between the 1st of December, 1878, and the 1st of April, 1879, was a coconspirator with Vaile and Miner. That truth fits the facts developed in this case; but the lie told by Vaile and Miner that Dorsey was not at that time connected with them does not fit. There is a ragged edge. You cannot get it in. The wind whistles through the crevices that are left, and down comes the structure. Put in the truth and it is a compact, solid, smooth, and entire mass perfect in its harmony.

But, gentlemen, I am not yet done with this matter, and will follow it on right now and see if I cannot further confirm it. I first submit that the fact sworn to by Vaile and Miner is confirmed by John W. Dorsey's experience on the Tongue River route. I will turn to John W. Dorsey's experience on the Tongue River route as one of those incidental things that I told you lay a little off my path, but which confirm the truths that lie directly in the path and which I will bring in as I pass by. Boone testifies that John W. Dorsey swore to the proposals before him in blank, and that the other parties filled them up and inserted the date of the jurat on the day they were finally completed. That is not denied. Boone testifies again that John W. Dorsey told him, pending the investigation in 1879, that this business did not suit his taste, and that he wished he was back home. That is not denied. Moore testifies that John W. Dorsey told him in March or April, 1878, that his brother had him here on some business that he did not know anything about, and he wished he was back home. He was in with Vaile and Miner. That is conceded. John W. Dorsey says his brother had him here on some business he did not know anything about and says, "I want to go home." Pity for him he had not gone home! Pity for him he ever left his home! He never would have left it, probably, had not his aspiring brother dragged him forth to make a dummy of him and helped corrupt him as he had corrupted Rerdell, profiting by the false affidavits of the brother of his own blood; debauching his own family, teaching them to make money for him and themselves by the ways of vice and iniquity and crime.

Coll McLellan testifies, on pages 2656-59, that when they were in camp at Beaver Creek on the route between Bismarck and Fort Keogh John W. Dorsey told him, in July or August, 1878, that in about three months he expected a tri-weekly service, and in three months afterwards a daily service; that they were expecting to lose money on the weekly service, but when it was increased and expedited they expected to realize $150,000; they expected to get the increase through the influence of his brother, Senator Dorsey; that they had organized a ring here in Washington, and the witness understood that they had an understanding with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. This man McLellan testified that John W. Dorsey told him of the increases and expeditions that were to come, and the why and wherefore they were to come was this: "I have a brother in the Senate. We have organized a ring in Washington, and there is an understanding with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General." Standing solitary and alone that declaration of a man coming down through a series of years might, as Mr. Ingersoll has said, not receive a great deal of credit. The word spoken goes out on the air and it can never be recalled. Thereafter it may never be rewritten, and may not make its true and real impress on the mind that hears it. The waves of time rolling over the memory may partially efface some of the characters that word imprints, so that when years afterwards it is read it does not sound precisely as it was spoken. Give them, therefore, the benefit of every doubt which may arise in reference to the entire accuracy of testimony in regard to conversations long since passed. Give me the benefit of every confirmatory circumstance that shows the testimony now repeated to be an accurate transcript of the words then uttered. Let us go on. Now, as I say, McLellan confirms Vaile and Miner, for Vaile and Miner swear that Dorsey was in with them at that time. John W. Dorsey tells McLellan of the ring that was composed of Vaile and Miner and S. W. Dorsey.

The COURT. No. That does not refer to the same time, I think. Vaile and Miner's affidavit refers——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] To the period from the 1st of December, 1878, to the 1st of April, 1879. This is August, 1878. It is the same ring. John W. Dorsey was out there at their bidding; John W. Dorsey was out there doing the service for these very men that employed Rerdell in December. Not Vaile. He was not in then. He came in directly afterward. It was Miner's route. Vaile came in mysteriously, and charitably took up the burden of these losing routes immediately afterwards. Strange to say, the increase and expedition, sworn by those men as promised by John W. Dorsey, came on the 23d of December, 1878. Isaac Cable testifies that he helped John W. Dorsey in building the ranches. When they were at Beaver Creek in the latter part of July, 1878, he heard a conversation between him and McLellan. The men had made a "kick" for their pay. Dorsey said that they did not expect to make any money then; that they took these contracts low to keep out small bidders, knowing that there would be increase of service, and that they would get the increase through the influence of his brother, Senator Dorsey; that there was a ring in Washington; and that if the service was increased as was expected the pay would be $150,000 at the end of the year. McLellan testified to the conversation in which John W. Dorsey told him that a ring had been formed here in Washington to deal with these routes. Isaac Cable testified that he was present and heard the conversation, and that John W. Dorsey did say there was a ring here to take care of these routes. Vaile and Miner swear that S. W. Dorsey was in combination with them upon these routes. The records written from time to time in the Post-Office Department show that these routes were manipulated by a ring. Thomas J. Brady, breaking through the restraint of all law, trampling under foot every obligation of personal honor and legal authority, enlarged the pay upon these routes from forty-odd thousand dollars a year up to four hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars a year. The ring gave forth its sound as merry as a marriage-bell. It tinkled at the very breath of one of the conspirators. But whilst it sounded the announcement of the birth of their immense fortune plundered from the Government, it was sounding the death-knell of the honesty of the officials of the American nation.

The COURT. We will take our recess now.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the court please, before the recess I would like to correct a statement of Mr. Merrick's. I have the record. The only evidence as to the time of the reception of the Chico letter is by Rerdell himself. On page 2275, in his examination-in-chief, will be found the statement——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I did not say that there was any proof. I said that my conclusion was that it was written in 1879.

Mr. CARPENTER. Very well. I want to show what the proof is.

Mr. MERRICK. May it please your honor, is that proper? Does he correct anything I have said? Does he correct any misstatement?

Mr. CARPENTER. The statement is that it was written in 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not say that is the proof. The letter is dated in 1878. It is supposed to have been written in 1878, and I say that from circumstances I expect to show that it was probably written in 1879.

Mr. CARPENTER. All the more reason then why I should read the testimony.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; because there is no answer.

The COURT. Not after Mr. Merrick has made this correction.

Mr. MERRICK. He is going to read precisely what was read by Mr. Ingersoll in his argument.

Mr. CARPENTER. But, if the court please, he intends to show it was written in 1879. Rerdell says it was not.

The COURT. Wait until he gets to that point.

Mr. CARPENTER. He never will get to it.

The COURT. Then it is not worth while to make any correction about the matter.

Mr. CARPENTER. You will see the evidence is it was received in 1878.

Mr. MERRICK. It don't make any difference.

Mr. CARPENTER. You don't dare to have the record read.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not intend to have any reply to me.

Mr. CARPENTER. There will be as many replies as you make misstatements.

Mr. MERRICK. Show me a single misstatement.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am trying to.

Mr. MERRICK. I have made no misstatement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I just want to call attention to this: While the evidence is it was received in 1878, Mr. Rerdell swears positively that he did not receive it in 1879, and positively that he did not receive it in 1877, and positively that Dorsey was not here in 1878, and positively that he was here in 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. The ship is wrecked. It is the last plank the pirates cling to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Rerdell is your last plank.

Mr. MERRICK. You will see he will float above your doom.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He will sink with your last plank. He is a rotten plank.

The COURT. This is entirely out of order.

Mr. MERRICK. This is recess, I believe.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I should not have replied if Mr. Merrick had not said what he did.

Mr. CARPENTER. We will apologize.

The COURT. We will take our recess.

At this point (1 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MERRICK. With submission to the court and gentlemen of the jury: Cable, as I have said, states that the men, to use his own language, had made a "kick" for their pay, and it seems from his testimony that it was in consequence of that disturbance among the men, by reason of their apprehension of danger in reference to their pay because of the low price of the route, that the conversation took place between Dorsey and McLellan, in which Dorsey stated to McLellan in the hearing of Cable that they had taken the route at this low price, that it would be expedited, and that there was a ring in Washington City of which his brother was a member. In confirmation of that John W. Dorsey writes to Rerdell on September 27, 1878, and states that the men are clamor- ous for their pay. This shows a condition of things in September among the men in reference to their pay which is confirmatory of the conversation had previous to that time, and of the circumstances out of which that conversation grew. On page 2239 the letter referred to will be found :

M. C. RERDELL :

DEAR SIR : I have just returned from the prairie, but did not find the money here to pay off the men, and they are clamorous for their pay.

It is therefore evident that the men were disturbed about the probability of being paid, because they knew the contractors would not get from the Government enough to pay them on the rate of pay the contractor was then receiving, and that naturally laid the basis for the conversation in which John W. Dorsey quieted these apprehensions by telling the men the fortune that was in store through the manipulations of the potential ring that stood behind him in Washington City. I may remark here, in passing, that this route was increased to three trips and expedited on December 23, 1878 (page 2139), and on August 11, 1879, it was increased to six trips (page 2151), making their pay $70,000, where it had originally been only $2,350. John W. Dorsey testifies that as to this conversation, which I have already read to you, so far as increase and expedition are concerned, he did not know anything about it until Rerdell came out there. If Rerdell told him about these prospective benefits, how did Rerdell get the knowledge ?

Rerdell swears he got it from S. W. Dorsey. He could not have evolved it from his inner consciousness. He must have got it from somewhere. If, then, John W. Dorsey can be presumed to tell the truth, that he got his information from Rerdell, it is confirmatory evidence of Rerdell's statement that Rerdell got his information from S. W. Dorsey at the time S. W. Dorsey sent him out there.

Howard T. Lambert, who was a carrier on the route, testifies that Dorsey told him in September that the route would be expedited ; and again, on page 2179, that he had another conversation with John W. Dorsey in January, 1879, and Dorsey told him that it was not his fault that the road was not equipped ; that his brother was running that part of the business, and that his brother was putting up the money for it. One peculiar circumstance in these conversations is the statement detailed by McLellan, who testified, on page 2657, that John W. Dorsey told him at one time that he did not care whether they got through on time or not ; that they expected to draw the pay just the same.

Before I pass from this route in this connection, I think it proper that I should repeat to you that it is a recognized fact in the testimony that the route ran through a wilderness without population where the huntsman scarcely went and where the red man found his home in safety from the intrusions of the white man, and that those who went upon the route needed, and actually had, a military escort, and that the military mail had been carried at a merely nominal sum. [To Mr. Bliss.] How much ?

Mr. BLISS. I do not think that appears in the evidence.

Mr. CARPENTER. There was no military mail carried.

Mr. MERRICK. At any rate, the route ran through a perfect wilderness.

The COURT. There was a military mail——

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] It appears in the evidence that there was a military telegraph, and it also appears in evidence that there were special mail messengers.

Mr. MERRICK. That is it—special mail messengers.

Mr. BLISS. But as to the military mail, that was on the Canyon City route.

The COURT. One witness testified that he carried the mail for several months seventy-five miles of the distance.

Mr. BLISS. Not on this route. That was McBean on the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route. There was a military mail on that route, and the rate of pay appears in evidence. There also appears to have been a military mail on the White River route, but the rate does not appear in evidence. There appears to have been a special mail by a messenger on the Bismarck route with no evidence of the amount.

Mr. MERRICK. There was a special mail for the benefit of the military. There was no population and no need of a mail except for the military. General Miles and General Sherman and these military men who testified about the route you must bear in mind would gladly picket the whole national frontier from Alaska to the boundaries of Mexico with the auxiliaries and agencies of the Post-Office Department to save the Army.

Now, gentlemen, I respectfully submit that John W. Dorsey's experience on the Tongue River route and these conversations with McLellan and with Cable corroborate the statement under oath of Vaile and Miner, that S. W. Dorsey was in this combination manipulating the department here in Washington. These conversations state that they had an arrangement with Brady and that they had a ring; that S. W. Dorsey was the leader. Miner and Vaile swear that S. W. Dorsey was a member of that concern of Vaile, Miner & Co. practically. That is the result of their oath. What other confirmation is there of the fact that S. W. Dorsey prior to April 1, 1879, was in this organization and the leader of this conspiracy? We have S. W. Dorsey's letter of March 4, 1879, found on page 3892. On the 4th of March, 1879, the date that Dorsey ceased to be a Senator of the United States, he writes to T. J. Brady, Second Assistant Postmaster-General, as follows:

SIR: Being duly empowered to act for John M. Peck and John W. Dorsey, mail contractors, I hereby enter in their behalf my protest against the acknowledgment of any subcontracts or powers of attorney now on file in your department, or which may hereafter be filed in the name of H. M. Vaile, or in the name of any other person.

These subcontracts or powers of attorney were made and filed without the knowledge, authority, or consent of said Peck and Dorsey, and in their behalf I demand that they be canceled on the first day of April, and that no other subcontracts to any person whatsoever, shall be accepted by you upon any mail routes in the names of said Peck and Dorsey, except those in the Indian Territory, unless such subcontract shall be accompanied by a power of attorney given by said Peck and Dorsey after the date of this letter.

I am, respectfully, yours,

S. W. DORSEY,
For JOHN M. PECK.
JOHN W. DORSEY.

This was his first act when he ceased to be a Senator. You will recollect that he could not remember when he got the power to write that letter or how he got the power; whether it was given verbally or in writing, and whether his power of attorney was prior to the 4th of March or after the 4th of March; yet on that day he assumed open control of the matter. Let us see what Vaile further says in this year of grace 1883, in confirmation of what he says in 1879 as to S. W. Dorsey's connection with these transactions. Let us see whether Vaile has not by accident been led into denouncing himself as guilty of perjury on the stand when he stated that S. W. Dorsey had no interest in the routes. On page 4018 I find the following in Vaile's testimony:

Q. Now, can you recall when you had the next meeting with reference to an adjustment of the differences between you?

He had met Dorsey at the German-American Bank in December 1878.

A. I have no recollection of meeting him again until about the 5th or 6th of March.

1879.

It is possible I may have met him during the winter, but I have no recollection of it.

Q. March, 1879?—A. 1879.

Q. Where was that?—A. At his house.

Q. What took place between you?—A. A separation.

Can bodies not united be separated? If a separation took place it was a separation of united bodies. "What took place between you and S. W. Dorsey—not between you and Miner, not between you and Peck, not between you and John W. Dorsey, but what took place between you and S. W. Dorsey?" A separation. If they had never been united how could they separate?

Let us go a little further. He did not understand the force of the language he was using, for truth sometimes may well up even from unwilling lips:

Q. I want to know whether you quarreled or not?—A. We did.

Q. What was the result of it?—A. We divided the routes and divided the debts.

By the COURT:

Q. What time was this, did you say?—A. About the 6th of March, immediately after S. W. Dorsey went out of the Senate; I think it was on the 6th of March.

Immediately after it became no longer material to Dorsey that he should have a cover thrown over his transactions here he separated from Vaile, who had been to him a veil indeed; but a veil that only heightened and made more distinct that which it pretended to conceal.

I know I intended to reach here immediately after the 4th and get it fixed in some way.

By Mr. HENKLE:

Q. I want to know, from the state of feeling between you and Senator Dorsey, whether you had determined that you would not go on in business with him or not?

Brother Henkle also had lost sight of the force of language for the moment in the current of truth rushing through his mind. Let me read that question again:

Q. I want to know, from the state of feeling between you and Senator Dorsey, whether you had determined that you would not go on in business with him or not?

Then they had been in business together. They were going to stop that business in which they had been united together. He would not go on any longer. This team had been pulling one wagon side by side, and one horse said, "I am going to jump out of the traces; I will not pull with that other horse any more." He had been pulling with that other horse, or else he would not say, "I will not pull any more."

A. I had.

I had so determined.

Nothing on earth could have made me go on with him.

"I have gone far enough. I have run him through his Senatorial term, pulling side by side, neck to neck, that common wagon, laden with our common spoil. Now he is out of the Senate. We will dump down the load and divide the robbery, but I will not pull with him any longer. It is true, after we do divide we will covenant to help each other to rob more on the same basis; but I will not pull with him any more in that wagon. Take the old wagon and pull it with one horse, or hitch in Peck or John W. Dorsey or anybody you like; I am going to hitch Miner along with me." Now the next question:

Q. Then you were determined to have a separation?—A. That was my determination.

"Divorce or death. We had been married. We have tried it. We have got enough of it. We must separate. One of us must go out. The thing won't work."

Q. And you say it was with that view that you called upon him at his house?—A. It was.

Q. And you made Lim a proposition which he accepted?—A. He at first refused, but subsequently accepted it.

Vaile swears here to the very identical thing that he swore to in 1879 in Rerdell's suit; that Dorsey was one of their concern and united with them. Now, let us see what Miner has to say about this business. Miner testifies with regard to the matter on his examination-in-chief. I read from page 4169:

Q. I want to know now if you had any conversation with Senator Dorsey late in the winter, or at any time in the winter, in which he said anything about what he proposed to do with Vaile when he got out of the Senate.

Mr. MERRICK. I object.

The COURT. Have you any proof on that subject?

Mr. MERRICK. Not a particle.

Mr. HENKLE. No, sir; but it is in the same line. I want to show that Dorsey in the winter said to Miner that when he got out of the Senate he was going to kick Vaile out of this whole concern.

At another place in the evidence Miner testifies that this is what Dorsey told him. Now, we have both of these men, may it please your honor, testifying to their unhappy union, testifying that their afflictions in that union were such that they could no longer continue that union, at least in the close relations which that union had established from 1878 down to April, 1879. Vaile came on to get a separation, and was determined that he would not go on with Dorsey. He found Dorsey ready, with his mind prepared, having made it up in December, January, or February, to kick Vaile out of the whole concern. That was a very pretty family quarrel as it stood; but it was a family quarrel; they were all in the family.

I think, gentlemen, that what I have now gone over conclusively establishes beyond the possibility of a doubt the connection of S. W. Dorsey with this conspiracy from the period of its inception down to April 1, 1879. If Dorsey was not connected with it, then his statement to Miner that he intended to kick Vaile out is untrue, for he would have to be on the inside, I suppose, in order to kick another man out. Vaile's statement that he wanted a separation and would not go on with Dorsey, and Vaile and Miner's oath in the Rerdell suit, that if the suit went on the testimony would develop who were the real parties of Vaile, Miner & Co., taken in connection with Dorsey's directions to Boone, with Dorsey's management and control, with the fact that Dorsey furnished the money, all make it perfectly apparent beyond a doubt that S. W. Dorsey was the central figure of this organization prior to April 1, 1879. This is confirmatory of Rerdell's testimony and condemnatory of the testimony of S. W. Dorsey, who swears to the contrary.

Before I come to consider what transpired at the settlement in 1879, I propose to devote a few minutes to the consideration of another circumstance in reference to S. W. Dorsey, which, if I mistake not, must in your judgment blot him out of this case as a witness, except in so far as his appearance on the stand confirms your judgment of his guilt. I say to you now that I am entering upon a proposition in maintenance of Rerdell's statement, and I propose to show that S. W. Dorsey has convicted himself beyond the hope of redemption. My proposition is this: That when a defendant in a criminal case takes the witness-stand, in the exercise of his privilege to testify under the statute of the United States, and refuses to answer questions put by the Government counsel, or, which is the same thing, refuses to bring forward written evidence shown to be in his possession, every presumption is against him, and the jury will regard such refusal as evidence showing that if the questions were answered or the written testimony were produced it would convict the accused. You will readily appreciate the wisdom of such a construction, for when a prisoner at the bar takes the stand he takes it under the implied pledge that he will deal fairly and frankly and disclose everything. When an ordinary witness, not a party to the case, takes the stand and refuses to answer, his refusal to answer may affect himself alone, and the court may deal with him by the exercise of judicial authority to punish him for contempt of court and coerce an answer. But when a party to the case, a prisoner at the bar, takes the stand and refuses to answer or to produce a paper, which is the same thing as refusing to answer, the court cannot punish him and compel him to answer or to produce the paper. Any such exercise of judicial authority would be regarded as cruel and harsh, in the first place; and in the second place, it would arrest for the time the regular order of the judicial proceeding. We must therefore accept the refusal, and the jury is bound to draw its conclusions according to the logic of common sense from such refusal.

The presumptions that arise from the refusal of a defendant to produce books and papers admitted to be in his possession depend to a certain extent upon the position that the defendant occupies as a witness in the case. The general rule in civil cases as to the presumption arising upon a failure of a party to produce a paper material in the case is well understood, and is well explained in the case of The Life Insurance Company against The Mechanics' Fire Insurance Company, 7 Wendell, 31. I do not know that I should pause to consider and to read any of the cases to which I have references. Perhaps my Brother Bliss will look at them and see if there is anything that will help to enlighten my argument; if so, I will be obliged to him.

THE COURT. You hardly propose to discuss questions of law before the jury, I suppose.

MR. MERRICK. Oh, no. I will read them merely as part of my argument, desiring at the same time, if I state any proposition of law that is not correct, that your honor may exercise your discretion and say I am right or wrong.

If the secondary evidence is imperfect, vague, or uncertain, every intendment and presumption should be against the party who might remove the doubt by producing the higher evidence. But, first, some foundation must be laid by general evidence of contents.

MR. HENKLE. The law on that subject is to be given by the court, and not by counsel.

MR. MERRICK. Law is just the thing you don't want. Am I not to have any law at all?

Mr. HENKLE. Not in your argument to the jury.

The COURT. As the court has repeatedly intimated to counsel on both sides at the commencement of the argument, counsel may discuss the subject to the jury, assuming such principles of law as the counsel believe to be correct. If the proper request is presented the court will instruct the jury upon any questions of law afterwards.

Mr. HENKLE. I understood your honor to decline to allow Mr. Ingersoll to argue questions of law.

Mr. MERRICK. Not this question. That was another question.

Mr. HENKLE. Mr. Merrick is arguing a question of law, as I understand it, to the jury.

The COURT. I understand him to disclaim any purpose of that kind, but merely that he is stating the law as he assumes it to be.

Mr. HENKLE. I have no objection to Mr. Merrick's stating to the jury what he claims to be the law, but I think he has no right to discuss the law to the jury.

Mr. MERRICK. I can give my reasons for my claim, can I not?

Mr. HENKLE. No. I think your reasons should be addressed to the court.

Mr. MERRICK. Then I will embrace my reasons in my general propositions and address them to the court. I must have some law to go on with.

Mr. HENKLE. The question my brother is discussing to the jury is a question we dispute entirely. We claim the law to be clearly the other way.

Mr. MERRICK. And the facts too, do you not?

Mr. HENKLE. Yes; all the facts. We know the facts are the other way.

Mr. MERRICK. That is what I thought.

Mr. HENKLE. I thought you thought so.

The COURT. It is hardly worth while to be reading authorities to the jury on propositions of law. You can assume what you believe to be the law upon this point and proceed to apply your law to your facts.

Mr. MERRICK. All that I mean to do, if your honor please, wherever I read a book is simply to save myself from formulating the proposition.

The COURT. If that is your purpose, you have a right to do it.

Mr. MERRICK. That is all. I find my propositions better formulated in some of the books than I can formulate them. I merely read. What I read is not authority. The jury must take their law from the court. Gentlemen of the jury, when I read a book, because that book looks like a law-book, it is not necessarily the law. You must take your law from what the judge says. The judge, in the exercise of his judicial power, and in the performance of his duty, will instruct you what the law is, and advise you in reference to the facts. Such is the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CARPENTER. How do you know the court will advise the jury as to the facts?

Mr. MERRICK. The Supreme Court of the United States prescribes that as the office of a judge.

Mr. CARPENTER. There is no such law.

Mr. MERRICK. There is a great deal of law you have never read.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then there are two of us.

Mr. MERRICK. The Supreme Court of the United States lays it down as the right and the duty of the judge to instruct upon the law, and in his judgment where the facts are complicated to advise and counsel about the facts. The jury may follow the advice or not as they please.

The COURT. It is a matter of discretion with the court. If the case had not been fully tried and the facts fully discussed, and the court thinks that it may be of service to the jury in collating the facts and bringing them together and presenting them to the jury, it has the privilege to do so. That, however, is for the court to determine for itself.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly, it is not obliged to do it.

The COURT. If the court is of the opinion that its assistance to the jury in regard to the facts is unnecessary of course the court will not interfere with the jury.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is not what I complain about. I want to know why the counsel assumed to say what the court would do.

The COURT. The court may do it or it may not.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is what I supposed; but he says the court would.

Mr. MERRICK. I presume it will.

Mr. CARPENTER. Ah!

Mr. MERRICK. That is not the point between us. The point was as to whether the court could do it or not. What the court will do is not a question of law. You said there was no such law.

Mr. CARPENTER. You assumed to say that the court would advise the jury as to the facts, and I asked you how you knew it.

Mr. MERRICK. And I answered you.

Mr. CARPENTER. No. The court has said you are mistaken. You do not know at all.

The COURT. I understood Mr. Merrick's proposition to be this: That the Supreme Court of the United States had laid it down as the duty of the court.

Mr. MERRICK. In a complicated case.

The COURT. The court has to decide as to the proper case.

Mr. CARPENTER. [To Mr. Merrick.] I thought you were in error about it.

Mr. MERRICK. That is the law and I am glad you have learned it.

Mr. CARPENTER. I thought you were in error about it.

Mr. MERRICK. I am glad you have learned it. It may serve you on a future day.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am one of those people who can learn.

Mr. MERRICK. Your friends are glad you know the fact.

Mr. CARPENTER. They all do know it.

Mr. MERRICK. Hope springs eternal in the human breast.

Mr. CARPENTER. So I judge from the way you go on.

Mr. MERRICK. A party defendant cannot claim the advantages of the position of a witness, and at the same time avoid its duties and responsibilities. If he becomes a witness he is, as is stated in one of the decisions of the supreme court of Massachusetts, in a more disadvantageous position than another witness, because he then has upon himself all the responsibilities of a witness and a party.

The COURT. In other words, he is at liberty to claim no protection or indulgence in his capacity as a witness in consequence of his being at the same time a party in the case.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir.

The COURT. His privilege as a defendant will not protect him against his obligations as a witness. If he goes on the stand he has that disadvantage.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir. As to his obligations I find a proposition, which I am discussing in part, well formulated in the case of The State against Ober, 52 New Hampshire, page 464 :

His object in taking the witness stand was to show himself innocent of this offense by testifying that he had not kept liquors for sale within the year, and putting himself in such a position, and declining to testify except to such matters as would tend to exculpate him, and refusing to answer direct and material inquiries raised in the case, was a matter of great significance, which it was the right if not the duty of the State's counsel and of the court to bring prominently to the attention of the jury.

In the case of The Commonwealth against Webster, 5 Cushing, 316, I find the proposition put in this shape :

Where probable proof is brought of a state of facts tending to criminate the accused, the absence of evidence tending to a contrary conclusion is to be considered, though not alone entitled to much weight, because the burden of proof lies on the accuser to make out his whole case by substantial evidence.

The burden is on the Government all the time. It never shifts.

But where pretty stringent proof of circumstances is produced tending to support the charge, and it is apparent that the accused is so situated that he could offer evidence of all the facts and circumstances as they existed, and show, if such was the truth, that the suspicious circumstances can be accounted for consistently with his innocence, and he fails to offer such proof, the natural conclusion is that the proof, if produced, instead of rebutting would tend to sustain the charge.

Mr. HENKLE. Now, your honor, that is precisely the reverse of what is decided in 17 Wallace.

Mr. MERRICK. Not a bit of it. Not a bit of it. 17 Wallace only holds that the burden of proof is always on the Government.

Mr. HENKLE. I wish you would address your argument to the court upon these disputed points of law.

Mr. MERRICK. Then why does the counsel interrupt me when I state my propositions, by telling the court that I am contradicted by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HENKLE. Because you are reading from an authority—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I am stating my proposition. I am presenting a decision and reading it as my proposition.

Mr. HENKLE. I do not think you have a right to do that.

Mr. MERRICK. Why ?

The COURT. You can ask the court for an instruction on that point.

Mr. MERRICK. Ask the court. He will give you an instruction.

Mr. HENKLE. Yes ; but my learned friend is making an impression on the jury.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly I am, and I hope I am making a good one.

The COURT. He has been trying it for a week.

Mr. HENKLE. He has been trying it for two weeks.

Mr. CARPENTER. On the same question his honor ruled that Colonel Ingersoll must address the court.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir. Colonel Ingersoll was addressing the jury and claiming that they had a right to decide upon the law and the facts, and the court said counsel could not discuss the question in reference to the admissibility of a piece of testimony, and he had to stop.

Mr. CARPENTER. It was precisely the same question in regard to the non-production of the books ; identically the same question.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir. It was in regard to the admissibility of testimony, and the court said he could not argue that to the jury at all ; that such a question was exclusively for the court.

The COURT. Now, Mr. Merrick, go on in your own way.

Mr. MERRICK. Then, your honor, keep that row quiet [referring to defendants' counsel].

The COURT. Please not to interrupt him any more. He can state his propositions. Of course I cannot concede that he has the right to argue questions of law to the jury, but he disclaims any purpose of that kind, and says he is merely using books for the purpose of stating his position.

Mr. HENKLE. He is reading authorities.

Mr. MERRICK. I am not reading from any book.

Mr. HENKLE. You quoted from a book.

Mr. MERRICK. It is not in quotation marks.

Mr. CARPENTER. A very nice way to whip the devil around the stump.

Mr. BLISS. They do not like the whipping.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, gentlemen, I will go back.

But where pretty stringent proof of circumstances is produced, I say—and strange it is that the supreme court of Massachusetts agrees with me, and says precisely the same thing in precisely the same words—but where pretty stringent proof of circumstances is produced tending to support the charge, and it is apparent that the accused is so situated that he could offer evidence of all the facts and circumstances as they existed, and show, if such was the truth, that the suspicious circumstances can be accounted for consistently with his innocence, and he fails to offer such proof, the natural conclusion is that the proof, if produced, instead of rebutting, would tend to sustain the charge.

Now, these same propositions are formulated in other books, to which, since there is some objection, I will not refer. They will be laid before your honor.

The COURT. It will hardly be proper to repeat the same proposition by reading book after book.

Mr. MERRICK. I appreciate that.

The COURT. And so accumulate what would seem to be authority.

Mr. HENKLE. That is what he has done.

Mr. MERRICK. Is that so?

The COURT. I suppose General Henkle would hardly contend that that is so.

Mr. MERRICK. He is very much frightened; he would not say so under ordinary circumstances, but he is not fully responsible now for these little things.

Mr. HENKLE. What am I frightened at?

Mr. MERRICK. I shall argue these questions to the court, of course. I have stated my view of the law to the jury. Now, I will state to the jury one other proposition of law, or formulate it in a different shape. From my reading of the law, and from a careful examination of all the authorities, I have come to the conclusion that the proposition of law which I will now read to you is the law applicable to the facts in this case.

When a defendant in a criminal cause becomes a witness on his own behalf, and has been notified to produce books and papers admitted by him or shown to have been in his possession, and which, if produced, would have been competent evidence in the cause, and upon cross-examination such defendant witness reiterates his refusal to produce such books and papers, the jury is entitled to presume that such books and papers, if produced, would have disclosed evidence disadvantageous to such defendant, and such failure casts suspicion on all the other evidence adduced by said defendant, and is a circumstance tending to prove his guilt.

Mr. CARPENTER. I guess that won't do.

The COURT. Please read that proposition again.

Mr. CARPENTER. He says that is not in any book.

Mr. WILSON. The only book that it will ever appear in will be Mr. Merrick's speech when it is printed and bound.

Mr. MERRICK. Did not the court ask that very ornamental gentleman to keep quiet?

Mr. WILSON. I will keep quiet.

Mr. MERRICK. I know he will not do it. [To the court.] Shall I read it to you, or shall I hand it to you in writing?

The COURT. I do not know whether I ought to express an opinion about it. I understand your proposition to be this: That if you give notice to a defendant to produce a certain book, and he fails to produce it, you have a right to infer that the book would contain evidence against him.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir.

The COURT. If that is your proposition I cannot assent to it.

Mr. MERRICK. No, that is not the proposition.

Mr. WILSON. The proposition goes further than that, if I understand it.

Mr. MERRICK. I do think, your honor, that I ought to be allowed to go on.

The COURT. I want to understand that proposition.

Mr. MERRICK. I will tell you.

Mr. CARPENTER. I would like to have the stenographer read what he said.

The COURT. I requested Mr. Merrick to read again the proposition that he made.

Mr. MERRICK. I will do so:

"When a defendant in a criminal cause becomes a witness on his own behalf, and has been notified to produce certain books and papers admitted by him or shown to have been in his possession, and which, if produced, would have been competent evidence in the cause"—

That is the first—

"and, upon cross-examination, such defendant witness reiterates his refusal to produce such books and papers, the jury is entitled to presume that such books and papers, if produced, would have disclosed evidence disadvantageous to such defendant, and that such failure casts suspicion on all the other evidence adduced by said defendant, and is a circumstance tending to prove his guilt."

Now, the broad expression "books and papers" may be too large and too latitudinarian, but it can be brought down to specific papers. The prayer is predicated not alone of giving notice to produce, your honor, but also of the witness's answer on the cross-examination, and I will illustrate now, as I go along, in my argument to the jury, the application of this rule of law.

The COURT. You had better not undertake to defend your rule of law to the jury, because that would be arguing—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Oh, no, I am not going to defend the rule of law; I am going to argue the facts; that is all.

The COURT. You, of course, have a right to assume any proposition to be law, for the present.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly; I am not going to argue it.

The COURT. I give you my own intimation, though, that I will have to be convinced of the correctness of that proposition.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, your honor. If, for instance, a defendant has a paper in his possession—that is the meaning of the proposition—which relates to the transactions of the case, and he is notified to produce it, and does not produce it, and then he takes the stand and is asked on cross-examination to hand that paper in and does not do it, then the jury has the right to presume that, if produced, that paper would show evidence disadvantageous to him, and these authorities here on the table sustain that proposition.

The COURT. Well, I have never seen them.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, gentlemen, I will discuss the facts, and it is a matter of fact as well as a matter of law.

The COURT. Before you come to that, Mr. Merrick, I will repeat now what I have said before: That if a party, having documentary evidence in his possession, has received notice to produce that, and he fails to produce it after acknowledging that he possesses the paper or document, the other side may adduce secondary evidence to prove its contents. His having failed to produce it in obedience to the notice will create a strong presumption that the secondary evidence is true. But there is to be no unfavorable inference drawn against the defendant on account of his mere failure to produce a book or a paper.

Mr. MERRICK. On notice.

The COURT. On notice.

Mr. MERRICK. I agree to that.

The COURT. The unfavorable evidence arises out of the secondary evidence. The secondary evidence will stand as competent evidence against the defendant; and the defendant having failed to produce the primary evidence in the first place, in compliance with the notice, the secondary evidence is the best evidence, and, whatever that is worth, it must be against him, and be against him the stronger because of his having failed to produce the primary. But there is no presumption to arise against the defendant merely from his failure to produce books in evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, no, not at all.

The COURT. His failure to produce the books in evidence raises a strong presumption in favor of the secondary evidence as the true evidence in the case. That is the doctrine, I think, I have laid down before.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir, that is it; and I do not differ from the Court in that a particle; nor does this prayer express a particle of difference from that position. The unfavorable inference does not arise from the non-production on the notice; it is on the cross-examination. That is what I say. Suppose on cross-examination the witness refuses to answer—I do not want to argue this now—but it is on the cross-examination. I put in the word “notice,” though it is really a word unnecessarily inserted.

When a defendant in a criminal cause becomes a witness on his own behalf, and has been notified to produce books and papers admitted by him or shown by evidence to have been in his possession, and which, if produced, would have been competent evidence in the cause, and further than that, upon cross-examination, such defendant reiterates his refusal—and so forth.

The only reason for putting in a notice was to let him know that when he came to be cross-examined he had better be ready, for that is a matter about which he will be interrogated. It gives him notice that he will be interrogated about that upon cross-examination. I was not talking about the notice. I claim nothing under that. It is simply under cross-examination that I claim. Suppose a witness comes on the stand and swears, “I did not kill Robinson,” and he testifies all along that he did not kill Robinson. The prosecution says to him, “Here is the knife that was taken from his body; did you not have that knife in your possession on the night he was killed?" "I decline to answer the question."

The COURT. He is obliged to answer it, and on cross-examination you may interrogate him as to his books.

Mr. MERRICK. Then you cannot put him in jail; you cannot constrain him to answer, because you stop the trial.

The COURT. After all, it is a question of the weight to be given to secondary evidence under all the circumstances.

Mr. MERRICK. It is a question of the weight to be given to the evidence of the witness who thus testifies.

Mr. CARPENTER. Oh, no.

Mr. MERRICK. When a witness answers one question and refuses to answer another, what weight can you give to the testimony of such a witness as that?

The COURT. Oh, well, that is a general rule as to all cross-examinations.

Mr. MERRICK. That is all I am contending for.

Mr. CARPENTER. The court decided that he was not bound to produce them.

The COURT. Yes; the court decided that he was not bound to produce them on notice.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly not.

The COURT. But the consequence——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] The consequence of his non-production was the right to offer secondary proof. When he comes to his cross-examination, he takes the consequences then of the impression which his refusal as a witness may make. Now, what was the fact in this case under the notice? I asked for the books. They refused to produce them, and it was stated on the other side that we could not have the benefit of a notice in a criminal case, which the court overruled. On pages 2364 and 2365:

Mr. DAVIDGE. As we have declined to produce the letter-books, I think you might close.

* * * * *

Mr. DAVIDGE. You need not trouble yourself about our books or papers. When we think fit to produce them we will do so. We do not intend to HELP the prosecution in this matter.

On page 2388:

Mr. MERRICK. If I smoke out that book it will not, and if you do not bring it in the inference will be that you are afraid to do so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That inference will be a terrific thing.

At page 2391:

The COURT. That you will not produce it, then the court will assume that you have it.

* * * * *

The COURT. You have had a notice to produce it, and the answer is——

Mr. INGERSOLL. That I will not.

Page 2392:

Mr. DAVIDGE. No party on trial can be required to adduce anything in aid of the prosecution against him.

The COURT. Is it possible that that is the law?

Page 2393:

Mr. DAVIDGE. I repeat that the law of this land does not require a party upon trial in any manner to furnish any evidence against himself.

Page 2395:

Mr. DAVIDGE. Well, you cannot make the humblest defendant say one word, turn a key, do a single act in the direction of helping the Government against him. He has a right to stand within the sacred circle of the law, and tell the Government, "Do your worst." And that is just what we are telling this Government, "Do your worst; we will not help you; we know you are bent on sacrifice; you have got the instruments, you think; if you have, put them in operation; we propose to suffer the sacrifice, if the time should come. But it never will come," your honor, "but we do not propose to put ANOTHER KNIFE in your hand or to help you in any manner."

Pages 2397 and 2398:

The COURT. I will assume that the witness is credible, &c. * * * You have received notice to produce it, and have refused. You say that your refusal is not to be taken as an admission that you have the books. On the contrary, I think the authorities differ from you.

Page 3717:

Mr. MERRICK. We asked for the stub-book.

Mr. DAVIDGE. You will have that, too.

Mr. CARPENTER. You may get more stubs than you want.

Mr. Davidge says, "You will have that, too," but we never got it.

Now, the court says that no letter in the letter-book is to be read or looked at that does not refer to this subject; that nothing in any book is to be looked at—bear this in mind—except it refers to this case. I am reading these extracts to lay a foundation for what I am going to say.

On page 3907, on Dorsey's cross-examination:

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is very evident you will never see one of them. You would not get them even if they contained nothing but poetry about spring.

Do you believe we would not? When we asked about the stubs do you believe we would not have been allowed to see them if they had not contained something in them that was damaging? Remember that this is on Dorsey's cross-examination. When I asked for some of those books he was on the stand, sworn to tell the truth and the whole truth. After he had testified in his own behalf, upon examination by his own counsel, he comes into my hands for cross-examination, and I ask him to let me see that part of the letter-book where two pages had been torn out, and he refuses to do it. Now, I asked defendants' counsel this:

Will you produce the books containing those two mutilated places?

Mr. Ingersoll replies:

We will not.

The court had said that the places referred to were the only part of the books we could look at; that we could not turn over the leaves and look at anything else.

Page 4438:

Mr. MERRICK. Have you made an examination of the stubs of the checks?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. You are going to keep them, are you not?

I had called for the stubs of those checks.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

Page 3917:

Q. In looking for the letters of May 13, 1879, and December 9, 1878, in your books, did you examine the index to your books?

That is, for letters addressed to Bosler and to John W. Dorsey.

A. I did not ask Colonel Love that question. I don't know whether he did or not.

Mr. MERRICK. Will you allow us to see the index only?

Mr. INGERSOLL. We will not.

Mr. MERRICK. Will you allow us to see the index to the book of December 9, 1878, under the letter D?

December 9, 1878, under the letter D, was all I wanted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No.

I am addressing these questions to Dorsey on the stand.

Mr. MERRICK. Will you allow us to see the index to the book of May 13, 1879, under the letter B?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No.

Mr. MERRICK. I give you notice to produce the indices of these two letter-books.

The WITNESS. I am not sure that the book is indexed.

We proved by Gibbs that he had indexed the book. Now, that is the way the fact stood. On cross-examination, this defendant, Stephen W. Dorsey, testifying in his own behalf, having sworn to certain things, was asked to produce the record in his possession bearing upon those things. Having sworn that certain letters were not written, I asked to see the index, under D, of a certain date in December. "No, you can't see it." I then asked to see the index of his letter-book, under the letter B, of a certain date in May, 1879. He will not let us see that. Admits it to be in his possession, but will not produce it. Now, what is the inference from that answer and that conduct of this witness on the stand?

The COURT. The only inference is that your secondary evidence stands.

Mr. MERRICK. That is under the notice. But when the defendant himself refuses to answer a question or produce a paper, what is the inference, as a matter of fact? I am not speaking of law; I am speaking of it as to its effect upon the testimony of the witness generally.

The COURT. He is on the stand as a witness, and you are cross-examining him as a witness, and he is not obliged to produce the books.

Mr. MERRICK. He is obliged to answer the questions, is he not, your honor?

The COURT. Yes, he can answer the questions.

Mr. CARPENTER. I believe he did.

The COURT. He did answer the questions, but his refusal to produce the books, previously announced, as well as announced on his cross-examination, leaves you in no other position than that you have your secondary evidence to stand upon, strengthened by the fact, reiterated, that he will not produce his books.

Mr. MERRICK. I suppose that the jury must determine in reference to the credibility of the witness and how far they can regard his statements as important from all that he says, and all that he does not say, and from his appearance on the stand.

The COURT. Undoubtedly, that is true.

Mr. MERRICK. That is all that I mean. They must determine from the appearance of the witness and what he says; and this cuts up the argument, unless your honor will allow me to argue the law to you, which you do not wish to hear now.

The COURT. I think it would not be fair to the other side.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not suppose it would.

Mr. HENKLE. Unless you let us reply.

The COURT. Yes; but that would interrupt the course of argument.

Mr. MERRICK. Of course, and the other rule is laid down. I must assume my propositions of law, and argue my case upon those propositions. I have read my proposition of law as formulated in a case, and also read my proposition as formulated by myself.

Now, as a proposition of fact—I am reasoning upon facts—what shall the jury do with a certain piece of evidence, as matter of fact? What shall the jury believe, from a certain deportment of a witness, as matter of fact? Suppose you accuse a man of murdering John Robinson—the illustration I have just used—the defendant on the stand, swearing to tell the truth, and swearing he did not murder John Robinson, and you knew that there was a knife found in the body of Robinson which belonged to this man who killed him, and this man had got possession of the knife after the killing and after a witness had seen the knife in the body of the dead man, so that he could identify it again, and the murderer is on the stand to be examined, and you ask him: “Did you not have on that night a certain knife? Have you got that knife now?” “I have got a knife in my pocket.” “Will you let me have it and look at it?” “No.” What would you infer? Your witness, already examined, had specified certain marks upon the knife that he had seen, had described it. What would you infer from the defendants’ refusal to bring out the knife and show it? That if he did bring it out and show it to you it would condemn himself. This is ordinary logic on fact.

Mr. Ingersoll stated in his speech that he did not produce these books because he did not choose to give a chart for Rerdell to stake out his testimony by. That was the reason given in his speech for their non-production. I must say that I hope the counsel did not intend to deceive the jury as to his reason. But when I called for the stubs of the checks and the indices to the two letter-books, it was long after Rerdell had testified, and the Government had closed its case. Why did he not bring them in then, when S. W. Dorsey was on the stand on cross-examination? The reason for their non-production before Rerdell testified might have been a very good reason. Mr. Ingersoll says that his reason for not bringing in the books and papers was as I have just stated. But, gentlemen of the jury, that was on the notice. When S. W. Dorsey came upon the witness-stand to be cross-examined I asked him, after Rerdell had testified and had been dismissed, and the Government’s case had closed, to let me look simply at the index of his letter-book under the letter B for a letter dated December 9, 1878, and then I asked him to let me look at the index to his letter-book, under the letter B for April 13, 1879, and Mr. Ingersoll, in each case, replied: “I shan’t let you see it.” Now, if Mr. Ingersoll had not known at the time that there was something criminating in that paper, in its relation to the proof already offered, would he have refused to produce it? Put yourself in the attitude of counsel. The learned counsel was asked about the stubs of the checks, on Dorsey’s cross-examination, and after Rerdell had testified, “Have you examined the stubs of the checks?” He says he has examined them. “I suppose you will not produce them?” “No; we propose to keep them.” Now, he tells you that he had examined the stubs of those checks. This was after Rerdell’s testimony, when Rerdell’s testimony could not be staked out by that chart, for it was already in and was already staked out. Counsel had examined the stubs and knew what evidence there was in them, and in what language those stubs would speak if produced in court. Do you believe that unless the counsel had known that those stubs would have spoken language condemnatory of his client, he would not very gladly have said, “Here they are, make the most of them?” He looks with earnestness to the welfare of his client, and cherishes an active and sincere wish to do all in his power to benefit that client. Without judging of other men by myself, I say to this jury that if I had been called upon to produce a paper on the cross-examination of my client, charged at the bar of criminal justice, which paper I had previously examined and found to contain nothing detrimental to him, I would have felt recreant to my duty as his lawyer if I had not brought the paper before the court. Mr. Ingersoll's anxiety in the interest of his client has been manifested throughout this case; no one questions his ability and his capacity to judge of the bearing of evidence; and yet, knowing the inferences which any rational man would draw, he says, "I have examined the stubs of those checks, and you shall not see them." Why? Not meaning to find fault with his conduct as counsel, I should feel that I had no excuse for refusing to produce those stubs, except the excuse that, on examination, I had found that they would criminate my client. And if that is not common sense, there is no such thing as common sense.

The learned counsel on the other side showed his uneasiness, showed his appreciation of his peril in not producing those papers by the subterfuge he resorted to in the proposition he made, knowing, as he must have known, that the proposition could not be, even if acceded to, carried out by the court. Why did he make such a proposition, except that he knew that there was danger from his non-production of those books? He proposes that there shall be three men appointed by some process or other.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I said the court might appoint three that we would select.

Mr. MERRICK. The court might appoint three that we would select and they should take the books and examine them—an extra-judicial proceeding altogether that no court in Christendom could recognize! If done in a criminal case it would vitiate the whole trial; it would have been substituting three men for the jury. The counsel knew that perfectly well. His honor stated that he would not carry it out if it was agreed to by both sides. Moreover, how were you to swear those three men? You cannot administer an oath, make it binding and subject the affiant, if he swears falsely, to the pains and penalties of perjury, unless the law authorizes the oath to be administered. It would have been a mere sham to swear three men to do something which the law could not, by any possibility, recognize. But why propose those three men? Here were twelve men already sworn, sworn to do justice, and lawfully sworn. Was he afraid of you, gentlemen of the jury? Why not let you look at the books?

The COURT. No; the matter would have been brought to the court first, because the court has to decide upon the question of the admissibility of evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. Of course. Pardon me for passing your honor by; it was in the heat and rapidity of argument. The books would have had to be submitted to one man and one man alone, his honor on the bench, venerable in the discharge of the duties of his high magistracy, and whose integrity no man questions. Why, then, propose that three men should be selected, who, in some corner, should examine those books, instead of laying those books before the only man appointed by the law to say whether they should go to the jury or not? Knowing, too, that if this one man, this venerable magistrate, passed the books as evidence, or the indexes to the books, that they would go to twelve citizens sworn to try this case. Why talk about some petty tribunal of three men who could not be sworn? And when the judge had examined those books himself, what he might have seen that was not proper to be made public he would have locked up in his breast and allowed that breast to be cut open before he would have disclosed the secret. What he found proper to go to the jury would have gone to the jury, and that alone. The proposition, then, which the counsel made comes back to visit upon his head the very consequences which it was sought to avoid. For his non-production of those check-books, and of the indexes to those books, I say, necessarily raised the inference that they contained what we say they contained, and even other things far more damaging. The non-production of those stubs and of the indexes of those letter-books, as called for, cast a cloud over the whole testimony of his client as not sincere, open, frank, and in good faith. And he now comes forward and says that he had seen them himself, and would not let you have them; and then after that he shows his appreciation of the peril he is in by the subterfuge he adopts in order to escape that peril. Instead of escaping a peril by the subterfuge, the fact is apparent to you that it was but a subterfuge, and therefore it makes it more distinctly manifest that he knew his peril and feared your judgments.

I can not doubt but that he was willing to trust the judge. He knew that the books would go to the judge, and the judge alone at first, and only such parts as were competent and proper evidence would then go to you. But he did not adopt that course. Why? Because he knew that would be the ruin of his client. But to escape the imputations and consequences of his non production, he gets up a subterfuge in order to delude you into the belief that he was willing, under certain circumstances, to produce the books. But, gentlemen, there were no circumstances on God's earth that could have brought that stub-book into court, none that could have brought in the indexes of those letter-books; and, as the court says in reference to one point of law, the secondary evidence must stand unimpeached, which is, that the index would have referred to a torn place where Rerdell says there should have been this letter of Rerdell to Bosler and this letter of Dorsey to Bosler.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not understand that the court has so decided. A letter-book is secondary evidence itself, and a notice to produce a letter-book would simply amount to a notice to produce secondary evidence. I never understood the court so to decide.

Mr. MERRICK. The index is primary evidence, your honor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No; but the letter-book itself is secondary evidence, and I never understood your honor to decide that we must respond to notice to produce secondary evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. I am not talking about the notice; I am talking about cross-examination.

The COURT. No; I have not decided that point, because it has not been made.

Mr. MERRICK. That point has not been made.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But that point was made; I made it long ago, and your honor decided it exactly as you decided the other.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Ingersoll was not in when the court last spoke about it.

The COURT. I was speaking with my mind directed particularly to the stub-books and the index. The courts have held that copies of letters made by the press are themselves secondary evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir; I am only taking exception to the remark made about the letter-books, not about the stub-books.

Mr. MERRICK. Let it apply to the stub-books.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No; I do not want it to apply to the stub-books. I object to the remark about the letter-book, because the letter-book itself is secondary evidence, and notice to produce secondary evidence does not entitle proof to be given of the contents of that secondary evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. The index is not secondary evidence; the copy is. The index is another thing. He paraded a parcel of checks here. We did not care about the checks. We wanted the stub-books. Why? Let them bring in all the checks they like. But the stub-books, according to Rerdell's testimony, would have shown what checks he charged to mail, and who got the money on those checks; in some instances. May be we would have found a check to J. B. B. for $2,000, which Dorsey, on the stand, stated he had never drawn, whilst the witness Bissell swore he saw him draw it and took it from his own hand.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is not the testimony.

Mr. MERRICK. The check was passed directly to witness. He testified that he got it first, and then it was agreed that Tankersley should take it and get the money on it, and he gave it to Tankersley at the table, and that is the way the check was disposed of.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No; the testimony was that he did not know that any check was drawn to him, and his final recollection was that it was probably given to Tankersley.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, no; you will find that Bissell stated it exactly as I have stated it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will read from page 4433, at which I just happened to open :

Approximately how much, from the circumstances?

That is about the amount.

A. From the circumstances surrounding the check itself, my recollection would be that the check was for a sum in the neighborhood of $2,000, but I would not say, and never have stated, that the check was for exactly $2,000 or any other specific sum, because I had no recollection of it. The whole sum itself was not payable to me; it was payable to four different gentlemen, I think, and the check was collected by a gentleman other than myself, and the proceeds were by him afterwards distributed. My recollection as to the amount of it, of course, is indistinct and uncertain. I do not know that it was for $2,000, or for just how much it was.

Q. Where was it drawn?

The WITNESS. Do you mean in what town?

Q. In what locality?—A. In Leadville.

Q. Did you see S. W. Dorsey sign the check?—A. Yes, sir. Now, remember, that I do not swear positively that it was a check, or that it was a draft. My recollection is that it was a check, but I saw him sign, it whatever it was. It came into my hands for a second, and then passed to the other gentleman, who afterwards collected it, and paid to me my distributive share of it.

Mr. MERRICK. That is just my recollection.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Wait. He says further in his cross-examination, on page 4434:

Q. Do you not remember that it was given to Tankersley, and that Tankersley collected it?—A. My recollection is this, Colonel Ingersoll, stating it generally: That upon the occasion it was suggested that the instrument be made payable to me, and that my initials were asked by Senator Dorsey; and my recollection is that, before the delivery of the instrument, Mr. Dorsey himself, as I recollect it, asked would it not be just as well to let Tankersley (or "Tank," as we familiarly called him, he being an intimate friend of mine) collect it; and I said, "It makes no difference to me." As I recollect it that instrument was signed by Mr. Dorsey, and it was passed directly to Judge Tankersley; and after Tankersley got it, my recollection is that he passed it to me and I simply glanced at it and passed it back to him.

Now, we will come down to the question as to whom it was made:

I can only give you my best recollection, Colonel, in regard to that matter. I do not know positively which it was.

That is, as to whether it was a draft or a check.

Q. Do you recollect on what bank it was drawn?—A. Oh, no.

Q. Do you know where the bank was situated on which it was drawn?—A. I have no recollection of that at all.

The COURT. That is a little aside.

Mr. MERRICK. That is just as I stated it to be.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No ; it is not as you stated it. He did not say that Dorsey gave the check to him.

Mr. MERRICK. He did say so ; you read it yourself.

Mr. BLISS. Let me read one passage you omitted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have not read it all.

Mr. BLISS. Directly before where you commenced.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did not see it.

Mr. BLISS. [Reading from page 4433:]

Q. Judge Bissell, did you ever see a check drawn by S. W. Dorsey in favor of J. B. B. ?—A. According to my recollection, I saw a check drawn by Mr. Dorsey, and my recollection is that it was drawn to J. B. B. or bearer ; that is my recollection, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. Then he goes on to say that it was passed to him and he handed it to Tankersley.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He finally says he does not know to whom it was drawn.

Mr. MERRICK. So I stated, precisely.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not think you did.

The COURT. He states that as the fact according to his best recollection ; he was not altogether positive about it, and I presume, from the circumstances at the time when the check was given, there might have been some little obscurity in his memory.

Mr. BLISS. There was some attempt to try to make him say that it was a small amount, some $1,500, but he declined to do so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. They tried to prove that it was given to Bissell.

Mr. MERRICK. That may be so. You have got that in.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You tried to prove that it was given to Bissell.

Mr. MERRICK. Rerdell says that Dorsey told him that it was given to Belford and it was charged to mail. It was not given to Belford, but was given to Bissell at the gaming-table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that. There is no evidence about that gaming-table. You cannot find that in the testimony.

The COURT. There is no such evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. That is my inference from his testimony.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Rerdell does not say that.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir ; but I infer it from Bissell's testimony.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Rerdell does not say what you said before.

Mr. MERRICK. I say I infer that from Bissell's testimony.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You said that it was Rerdell who stated that.

Mr. MERRICK. Can't I speak of my inferences ?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, if you speak in a Pickwickian sense, all right.

Mr. MERRICK. But Rerdell says that Dorsey told him it was given to Belford.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He does not say that.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is not in the record.

Mr. MERRICK. Look for it.

Mr. CARPENTER. You will never find it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is my recollection, that he did not say it.

Mr. MERRICK. That it is charged to mail.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is another matter.

Mr. MERRICK. May it please your honor, will you protect me from this continual growl and snarl ?

Mr. CARPENTER. The counsel states that Rerdell said that Dorsey told him that the check was given to Belford. There is no such testimony.

Mr. MERRICK. Look and see.

The COURT. That is my recollection.

Mr. MERRICK. That is my recollection.

Mr. CARPENTER. I will find the testimony.

The COURT. You may be correct.

Mr. MERRICK. I have disturbed these gentlemen upon the other side so much that they can't help manifesting great uneasiness.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

THURSDAY, JUNE 7, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the court please, before Mr. Merrick proceeds, I desire to call attention to the question I raised yesterday. Mr. Merrick says in his speech :

Rerdell says that Dorsey told him it was given to Belford and was charged to mail

I stated yesterday that there was no such statement in the testimony of Rerdell. The testimony of Rerdell is very brief upon that subject, and I will read it to show there is nothing of that kind in it. I read from page 2384 :

Q. State them.—A. One to Samuel Jones and one to James B. Belford, member of Congress.

Q. What was the charge to James B. Belford?—A. Two thousand dollars.

Q. Money or what?—A. The amount was taken from his check-book.

Q. Did you charge it?—A. I did.

Q. How much was it?—A. Two thousand dollars.

Q. What was it for?—A. It was simply marked "charge to mail account" on the stub of the check-book.

Q. Was it for money paid to him, or for horses or chariots, or what?—A. I do not know that.

Q. When was that?—A. That was in the summer of 1879.

Q. What month?—A. I could not tell you that; probably July. I think it was July.

Q. Is that your best opinion?—A. That is my best recollection. I think it was in the month of July.

Q. Was there a check given to Mr. Belford?—A. There was.

Q. On what bank was it drawn?—A. Drawn upon the bank of Middleton & Co.

Q. For how much?—A. Two thousand dollars.

Q. Drawn to his order or drawn to bearer?—A. That I could not tell you.

Q. Did you hand him the check?—A. I saw the check.

Q. Did you hand him the check?—A. I did not.

Q. What was written on the stub of that check?

Then came a discussion, and that is all he said about it. Now, on page 2400 the whole testimony was ruled out by your honor. Your honor stated that it had nothing to do with the case, and ruled it out against the exception of the defendants. The whole testimony of Rerdell in regard to Belford was stricken out, and then weeks afterward Bissell was brought here to confirm what had been stricken out of the record. I will read, briefly, what your honor said on the subject:

The COURT, Very well; then the answer was not responsive to the question. It does not belong in this case, and I think it ought to go out.

Again :

It is not right to cast an imputation upon a respectable name without his having an opportunity to meet it, if possible.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He will have plenty of opportunity probably to meet it.
The COURT. Not in this case.

Again :

It is not a fact in the case at all.

Again the court :

I do not regard it as a fact in the case, because there is no case on that matter of Belford's.

Again, on page 2401 :

We will eliminate that answer, because it does not involve anything in this trial.

There is no such thing in the testimony. It was all stricken out, and afterwards Bissell was brought here to corroborate a record that did not exist. The evidence of Bissell, I submit to the court, ought to be stricken out now.

The COURT. Bissell was not brought here in regard to the testimony in respect of Belford, but in regard to what Rerdell said in connection with the check, as I understood it.

Mr. CARPENTER. As Rerdell never said anything except what I have read, and as there is no J. B. B. and nothing about Dorsey telling him anything on the subject, I think the testimony of Bissell ought to be stricken out of the record. It is not a fact in it, and is not responsive to anything in the record. However, I have said all I wish to say about it.

The COURT. The testimony of Bissell will remain in the case.

Mr. CARPENTER. Very well.

Mr. MERRICK. Rerdell, subsequently in his testimony, speaks of the check as bearing the initials J. B. B.

Mr. CARPENTER. He does not, and you cannot show it.

Mr. MERRICK. Our friend, Mr. Carpenter, is very much in the habit of positive contradiction.

Mr. CARPENTER. Show it.

Mr. MERRICK. I cannot stop in the midst of my argument to contradict a man who does not seem to know what the record contains. Mr. Ingersoll, in his speech, commented on this subject, and stated that Rerdell had said so, and that it originated with him.

Mr. CARPENTER. You are utterly mistaken. Mr. Ingersoll denied that Rerdell had said any such thing.

Mr. MERRICK. He said it originated with him.

Mr. CARPENTER. He said Rerdell never said a word about it.

Mr. MERRICK. Rerdell did.

Mr. CARPENTER. He did not.

Mr. MERRICK. There is no use of this discussion.

The COURT. We will not go any further into the matter now.

Mr. CARPENTER. I think when counsel states it is so, and I deny it, he ought to exhibit the record.

Mr. MERRICK. I decline to take the trouble.

Mr. CARPENTER. We were obliged to do it.

Mr. MERRICK. You were obliged to take unnecessary trouble probably.

Mr. CARPENTER. You will never find it.

Mr. MERRICK. I will look and bring it in court to-morrow. In reference, gentlemen of the jury, to the subject of Mr. Belford and the check to J. B. B., charged to mail according to the stub-books, I desire to make in passing a single remark. Injustice may possibly have been done Mr. Belford by either the misapprehensions of the witness, the representations of Dorsey to the witness, or in some other way. Unfortunately Mr. Belford's name was introduced into the case as connected with these mail transactions. I endeavored to keep it out, and it was upon my own suggestion that the testimony in regard to him was finally stricken out. I think it due to Mr. Belford to say that there is no testimony in the case nor any that has been stricken out of the case that in any way implicates or involves him in the slightest degree in these star-route transactions. He is an honorable and a prominent gentleman, occupying a high position in public life. Rumors affecting him with regard to transactions that have so universally excited the odium of the entire people of the country may be calculated to do him some damage, and I make these remarks in reparation for any wrong that may have occurred and as an assurance of my just and correct appreciation of his character as a public man and as a citizen.

The COURT. In regard to that matter the evidence of Rerdell was as to what Dorsey told him.

Mr. CARPENTER. I beg your pardon. I have just shown your honor he did not say Dorsey ever told him a word about it. I have just read the record and showed your honor he makes no such statement. Rerdell does not say so. That was the point raised yesterday, and your honor said you thought I was wrong, and so I referred to the record and showed your honor this morning that I was right, and that he did not say that Dorsey told him one word about it. I read every word of Rerdell's testimony about that check.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Carpenter is entirely mistaken. There is other testimony.

The COURT. We will pass it over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. CARPENTER. When they find something else I will admit I am wrong. I do not see how anything else could have occurred, because it was then stricken out of the record. I do not think your honor would have allowed further interrogation, and as a matter of fact, I think there was not any.

Mr. MERRICK. Can you doubt, gentlemen of the jury, that if the books which I called for on the cross-examination of Dorsey contained nothing criminating him, that they would have been produced? Can you doubt, gentlemen of the jury, that if the stub-books of checks had contained nothing confirmatory of Rerdell and nothing indicating what checks had gone to "mail" that those stub-books would have been promptly exhibited to your inspection or to the inspection of his honor on the bench? I presume there is not a man among you that entertains a doubt upon that subject, not even one of the possible, hoped for two or three deliverers.

Now, gentlemen, what is the proof in reference to the contents of those stub-books? Torrey says, on page 3619, in reply to a question, as follows:

Q. Were there any other accounts in those books except those in relation to mining, ranches, and railroads?—A. There was a mail account.

Talking about the books that he had obtained from Kellogg, and was posting up.

Q. Did you keep that?—A. I entered up the twenty-eight or thirty checks that Mr. Rerdell drew and charged them to mail account.

Q. To what account were those posted?—A. They were posted to mail account, where it said "mail" upon the check-book; that is, upon the stub.

The checks to which he refers here you will recollect were checks drawn in February and March, when Rerdell took those check-books on to New York. For although Dorsey swears that Rerdell had access to those check-books only for a few days in 1879, it appears that a year or two subsequently he had the check-books in New York on two occasions, and there drew numerous checks at Torrey's office, according to Torrey's statement. S. W. Dorsey testifies upon the same subject, as follows:

Q. When was the mail account opened?—A. I think April the 1st, 1879.

Q. The stubs of that date show mail charged upon that day, do they not?—A. Some of them do.

You recollect that Dorsey says that it was in April, 1879, that he employed Rerdell to take charge of this matter. Rerdell was prepared upon the stand to identify the checks at any time which had gone to make up the sum that Dorsey took to the Post-Office Department and carried into Brady's room. The stubs would have shown what checks had been charged to mail on that particular day. They would have shown what checks on that day were charged to mail; and showing what checks on that day were charged to mail would have confirmed Rerdell in reference to the checks drawn for the benefit of mail on that day. This is what Mr. Ingersoll found when he examined the stubs of those check-books, in my humble opinion, and this is what kept the stub-books from your inspection, for an inspection of the stub-books, developing that fact, would at once have been fatal to the defendants' case.

You will bear in mind, gentlemen, that in this apparently long digression upon an important point I am simply showing the connection of S. W. Dorsey with these transactions. I think I have shown it to your satisfaction, but something still remains which in the full performance of my duty I am obliged to bring to your attention, and further thereby to trespass upon your patience. The subject of which I now propose to speak is one certainly somewhat remarkable. I cannot, myself fully untangle it and reconcile the evidence. But if there is confusion it is confusion made between the brothers Dorsey and confusion made between the conspirators, and the difficulty of its solution arises from the impossibility of getting from them the facts that would make that solution possible. I refer to the advancing of money by S. W. Dorsey in 1877 and 1878 upon these routes, and to the advancement of money in the same direction by John W. Dorsey. Mr. Ingersoll, in his opening address to the jury, said, on pages 445 and 446:

Gentlemen, he did pay John W. Dorsey $10,000, and he did pay the same amount to Peck, and from that day to this John W. Dorsey has never had the interest of one solitary cent in any one of these routes. He was simply paid back the money that he expended. Not another cent. John M. Peck never made by this business one solitary dollar. He simply received back the money he had expended.

Now, so far as John M. Peck is concerned it is not in proof that he ever put in one solitary cent. So far as John M. Peck is concerned, if Stephen W. Dorsey ever did pay him the $10,000 it was clear gain to John M. Peck. Let us see what the money transactions were of S. W. Dorsey and John W. Dorsey. Bear in mind that S. W. Dorsey testifies, and so does Boone, that he, S. W. Dorsey, advanced all the money necessary for this business in the year 1878; that Boone expended the money as Dorsey let him have it in paying for printing, for stamps, and for other purposes incidentally and directly connected with these transactions, until Dorsey's bill ran up as against the concern, according to his estimate of what he had done, to some $13,000 I think. He testifies that no money was paid to him. Now, let us see what John W. Dorsey says. I read from page 4111 of his cross-examination:

Q. Why did you not retire when you learned that Peck was no longer able to fulfill his part of the business?

This was in November and December, 1877, I think.

The COURT. The bids were not in then.

Mr. MERRICK. No; the bids were not in. Before the bids were put in, when the business was in its inception, you recollect John W. Dorsey got a letter from Peck that he could not go on. S. W. Dorsey says Peck's sickness prevented him from getting any bonds in Arkansas, and therefore he had to get them. Peck wrote to J. W. Dorsey that it was impossible for him to fulfill his part of the understanding.

A. I had gone so far I did not feel like doing it.

Q. Had you put in a cent?—A. I put some money in the business.

Q. To whom did you give it?—A. I sent it to S. W. Dorsey.

Q. I may be mistaken, but I understood S. W. Dorsey to say that he advanced the money.—A. THAT WAS A PRIVATE ARRANGEMENT BETWEEN HIM AND ME; THERE WAS TO BE NOTHING SAID ABOUT IT AT ALL.

Gentlemen, what does that mean? S. W. Dorsey says that he advanced the money. John W. Dorsey then said that he sent money to his brother, S. W. Dorsey. Being further interrogated about it he said that there was a private understanding between him and S. W. Dorsey, and there was nothing to be said about it at all. Here we have some secrets they did not choose to disclose when on the witness-stand.

Q. What was a private arrangement?—A. My furnishing that money.

Q. How much did you furnish him?—A. I don't know; I paid different sums at different times.

Q. As much as $5?—A. As much as $500.

Q. When?—A. Some of it was sent in about the 1st of December.

Q. How much?—A. I think it was $500.

Q. How sent?—A. By draft.

Q. On what?—A. I could not say now; it was a draft on New York.

Q. By whom?—A. I got it in a bank at Chicago.

You recollect when he was out in Chicago he got that draft.

Q. What bank?—A. I could not tell now.

Q. What time in the year was that?—A. That was in December.

Q. What year?—A. 1877.

Q. What expenses had been incurred here at that time needing money. Give me the details of it?—A. I think there was $300 paid for postage stamps.

That was to send Boone's circulars out West.

Q. What else?—A. Printing, stationery. I don't know what else.

Q. Tell the jury why it was that you did not give that money directly to Boone to pay those expenses, instead of giving it to S. W. Dorsey?—A. I was not here to give it to Boone. I did not know anything about Mr. Boone.

Q. You did not know anything about Boone?—A. No, sir; not at the time.

Q. You came here directly after you received that draft?—A. No, sir; it was two or three weeks.

Q. And at that time you knew nothing about Boone?—A. No, sir.

Q. You did not know that Boone was doing anything in the transaction at all?—

A. Yes, sir. I had not known anything about him personally at all.

Q. When was it definitely settled that Miner would go in?—A. Some time in November, I think. I cannot recollect just the time.

Q. It was settled that Miner was to go in before anything was done here, was it not?—A. Yes, sir; I think so.

Q. Nothing at all was done here before it was understood that Miner should come in?—A. No, sir.

Q. When did Miner come on here?—A. I could not tell you, from my personal knowledge, Mr. Merrick. All I know on that point is what he told me when I got here.

Q. Do you know when he got here?—A. No, sir; I don't know certainly of my own knowledge, but it was some time before I came. I should think some time in December.

Q. You knew Peck was not here?—A. Yes, sir; I knew he was not.

Q. Was Miner here at that time?

At the time he sent the draft to S. W. Dorsey.

A. I think he must have been; yes.

Q. To whom did you send the draft?—A. I sent it to my brother.

Q. Why did you not send it directly to Miner?

His partner here.

A. I did not know anything about Mr. Miner. There was no contract between us at that time, only verbal.

He would not send the money to Miner because, although Miner was his partner, he was his partner only in the covenants of a verbal contract. Let us go on and see how he reasons a little further:

Q. Did you not say that Peck was made a partner with him in October?—A. There was a verbal agreement made somewhere about November.

Q. Is it because you did not have a written contract with Miner that you did not send him that money?—A. That was the reason; that was the only reason I know of; I think that is the reason why I did not do it.

Q. Had not you and Miner, even at the time when you were in Chicago, already made a written contract to pool your interests, and were you not then all acting under a verbal contract?—A. Under a verbal contract, certainly.

Q. Were you not spending your money under a verbal contract?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it not under that verbal contract that debts were incurred for expenses?—Yes.

Q. If that was the case why did you send the draft to S. W. Dorsey, and not to Miner, with whom you had the contract?—A. Because I did not intend to put any of my money where I could not control it. I did not want to put it in the hands of a stranger.

His partner a stranger! His partner here, incurring debts in the name of the partnership firm, for which he was to answer under the verbal articles of partnership!

Q. Was Miner a stranger to this transaction?—A. He was a comparative stranger to me; we had no written contract at that time.

Q. Was not Miner here authorized to act for both you and Peck?—A. I suppose he was.

Q. And incur debts for you?—A. Yes.

Miner was authorized to act for him and Peck, and authorized to incur debts as a copartner; and yet this man dares to insult the intelligence of the jury by standing here as a witness and saying that, although Miner was so authorized to involve him to an unlimited extent in debts and liabilities, he would not send him a draft for $500 because he was a perfect stranger and there was no written contract, but sent it to his brother, Stephen W. Dorsey.

Gentlemen, to refer again to the philosophy of Mr. Ingersoll, a lie won't fit anywhere. This lie cannot fit. Now, let us go on and see what further we can learn:

Q. Did you then have any distrust of Miner?—A. No, sir; not particularly.

Q. Did you believe he would steal your money?—A. No, sir; I don't know as I did.

Q. Did you believe he would spend it unwisely?—A. I don't know what I did believe about it. I did just as I did because I thought it was best.

Q. Did you not know he was here acting under your authority in this mail business?—A. We were acting together, I suppose.

Q. You knew that, did you not?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever send S. W. Dorsey any other money?

Now, he wanted to get out on the $500 draft. That was all he had spoken of first. I asked him:

Q. Did you ever send S. W. Dorsey any other money?

Observe how he dodges around.

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever pay him any other money?—A. Yes, sir.

He never sent him any other money.

Q. Did you ever pay him any other money?—A. Yes.

Q. Where?—A. In Washington.

Q. How?—A. Paid him in currency.

Q. How much?—A. If it was $500 I sent him then, I paid him about $2,000.

He says paid now, recollect.

Q. On the 1st day of September you had $2,500 in your house?—A. No.

Q. October?—A. Yes.

Q. If you had that cash on hand, and an understanding that money was to be advanced by you to others in this mail business, why did you not use that money through your partner here, instead of borrowing from your brother, the Senator?—A. I did not borrow it.

Q. You did not borrow?—A. No, sir.

Q. Who did?—A. THAT WAS A CONFIDENTIAL ARRANGEMENT BETWEEN HIM AND ME.

What sort of a confidential arrangement? S. W. Dorsey swears that he was advancing money in the way of loans to these parties. His brother, John W. Dorsey, comes in and swears he was not advancing money in the way of loans; that they were not borrowing. When I asked him further about it, and pressed him down, his testimony is as follows:

Q. You did not borrow?—A. No, sir.

Q. Who did?—A. That was a confidential arrangement between him and me.

Where is the lie? It is lurking somewhere in this testimony. First he says he sent Dorsey $500, and leaves you to understand that that was all. Then when pressed he says his partner Miner was here, with authority that could overwhelm him with obligations and swamp the concern with debts, and then he says that Miner was a stranger to him, and he sent the money to his brother because he did not want to send it to a perfect stranger and put it beyond his control. Then I asked whether that $2,000 was advanced to S. W. Dorsey. "No," he says, "not advanced; I paid it to him; I gave it to him." Then when asked, for the purpose of getting at the fact, whether he did not borrow it, he answers, "That was a confidential arrangement between S. W. Dorsey and me." Yes, gentlemen, these arrangements were all confidential; they took each other into their confidence. Now, the United States Government, that they have robbed for their emolument, wants to be taken into their confidence too. We want them to admit us into that confidence, and we have pretty well got into that confidence, although this man throws up the evasive barrier of this answer in order to keep us from ascertaining what he knows.

Now, let us go a little further, for it becomes interesting as we progress:

Q. Did not your brother write to you for money?—A. No, I know he did not.

Q. He did not?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you know that your brother was advancing money on your account at that time?—A. I do not; I might have known it, but I don't know whether—

Q. [Interposing.] You, "might" have done anything.—A. I don't know as I did; I am not certain about it. [Page 4118.]

"Not certain about it." This man, whose fortune was not so large that he could deal with big sums without remembering them, who kept his $2,000 in his house to keep his creditors from getting at it, whilst his brother was advancing thousands of dollars, according to his testimony, swears that he does not know.

I don't know as I did; I am not certain about it.

Is not certain whether he was liable to refund to S. W. Dorsey anywhere from $10,000 to $15,000. Do you believe it? Common sense revolts at the idea of believing such a thing.

Q. You never did furnish Miner any money, did you?—A. No, sir.

Q. You gave it to your brother?—A. I let him have it.

Now see what comes next:

Q. The money you put in the mail business you put in through your brother?—A. Yes.

Q. You never gave Boone any money, did you?—A. No, sir; only as I used it to pay the expenses and for putting on service, and also postage.

Q. He was your partner?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you use it for that purpose?—A. It was used for that purpose.

Q. Did you use it for that purpose; did not your brother use it for that purpose?—A. I told him—

Q. [Interposing.] I do not care what you told him. Did you, or did he? He did, did he not?—A. Yes; he advanced the money ostensibly, but really I did.

Now see where he comes out:

HE advanced the money ostensibly, BUT REALLY I DID.

Disentangle it, gentlemen, if you can. I can only disentangle it and make it harmonious by my theory that here was a conspiracy, and S. W. Dorsey was putting in some of his money and John W. Dorsey was putting up some of his, and that the private understanding between them was to equalize the advances when they came to distribute the profits of their robbery. That was the private understanding. There was, as you see, a private understanding, the details of which he never communicates to the court and jury, and finally says that S. W. Dorsey was ostensibly advancing the money, but really John W. Dorsey was advancing it.

Gentlemen of the jury, I desire to call your attention for a short time to the Rerdell red books and the memorandum 31 X. There has been a great deal of discussion around this memorandum 31 X, and a great deal of discussion about those red books, of which Mr. Ingersoll, in the indulgence of his favorite entertainment of fixing up funerals, has put one at the head and the other at the foot of Rerdell's grave.

The inquiry arises in the mind of the jury, first, was that memorandum written by Dorsey, or was it written by Rerdell? Followed by the inquiry, were there ever any such red books containing the entries to Smith and Jones of money paid to Brady? Was there ever a book kept by Rerdell, as Dorsey's clerk, in which there was an account of Smith's, said Smith personating Thomas J. Brady? If the books are shown to exist, if you are satisfied from the proofs that the books do exist, and are satisfied from the proof that there is a charge in those books against Smith, then, gentlemen of the jury, that proves the genuineness of the memorandum. Why? For the reason that Rerdell says the entry in the book was made from this memorandum. If I prove the shadow of the memorandum on the books, it necessarily follows that the substance existed when that shadow was cast. Were there any such books as Rerdell has testified to, and did they contain the entry to which I have referred?

I may say frankly to you here and now, gentlemen of the jury, that I consider that I have argued this case and am done with it. If you are not convinced now, there is nothing, probably, that I shall say that will help to convince you. Nevertheless, in my position as representing the Government of the United States, it becomes my duty to my country, to the people, and to the Government that has placed this trust in me, not to leave any point undiscussed or any errors uncorrected. I feel oppressed with the consciousness that I am engaged now in a work of supererogation, for I am thoroughly satisfied in my mind and in my heart of hearts that when I quit the subject of the affidavits and left the record to go into the consideration of the parol and confirmatory proof, I had sitting before me a jury which ought to be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of every one of these defendants.

Did Rerdell have such books? Did such books exist? You will remember what Rerdell swears about the books. I make that remark, gentlemen of the jury, not with a view of resting the proof of the existence of those books upon Rerdell's testimony, but I take his testimony as the assertion of a fact to be proved by somebody else. You will bear in mind, therefore, what he asserted to be the fact—that when Dorsey ordered him to open a mail account, he gave him, among other things, this memorandum, and told him to make those entries in the book, and that subsequently he asked him if he had made that charge to Thomas J. Brady; that Rerdell said there was no account to Brady; that Dorsey replied, "To William Smith, then; damn it, don't you know that William Smith is Brady?" Bear that in mind. Bear in mind also that Dorsey swears that he never had any account with any man named William Smith. He also swears that he never had any account with Brady; of course he does. But the important feature of his testimony, in this connection, is that he never had any account with William Smith, never had any dealings with William Smith. Therefore, if William Smith is on those books it is no really existing William Smith with whom Dorsey ever dealt, for he never dealt with a William Smith. Bear that in mind.

Now we have the groundwork laid in Rerdell's assertion and in Dorsey's contradiction; and on that assertion and that contradiction we must proceed to search for the truth in the circumstances of the case under the operation of the logic used by common sense in the ordinary affairs of life.

The first circumstance to which I propose to call your attention is this: That, in 1879, at the time Rerdell says Dorsey gave him that memorandum, he employed Rerdell; that at that time Dorsey says he gave Rerdell exclusive and entire control of this whole business, and when asked whether or not he did not manipulate a certain affidavit, you recollect, he says, "I don't remember, but I am not sure." I asked, "Why are you not sure?" "I AM NOT SURE, FOR THE REASON THAT RERDELL HAD EXCLUSIVE CHARGE OF ALL THIS BUSINESS." You remember it. He had put him in exclusive dominion, and given him unlimited authority in the matter of these mail transactions. Now we have the relation established. If that was the case, and that relation existed, as Dorsey says it did, is it not reasonable to suppose that Dorsey told him to open a set of books?

What is the testimony directly upon the subject? In the fall of 1879, as I have told you, when Congress met, owing to the revolution in the custom of the department by which Brady had made the exercise of his power under this exceptional law a regular habit, it became necessary that he should apply for a deficiency to meet the drain upon the appropriations made in behalf of the department. Brady, therefore, went to Congress and asked for an appropriation of two millions of dollars. An investigation was instituted, and that investigation was tolerably severe, though not by any means thorough. Commencing in December, 1879, it proceeded through the winter months and the spring into the summer of 1880. Brady was a witness before that investigating committee. Miner was a witness before that investigating committee. Various persons connected with these contracts were witnesses, and Rerdell was summoned as a witness. The skies were lowering; the clouds were threatening; Brady and all his associate conspirators in these transactions were living in daily and hourly peril. And now, with Rerdell summoned as a witness, the peril threatened the lofty head of Stephen W. Dorsey. Ay, gentlemen, neglectful, thoughtless lightning threatened to strike that anointed skull. What was to be done? Rerdell, faithful to the trust reposed in him by his master, says, "I must protect myself; I must protect my master; I am, it is true, on a salary of $3,000 a year, and that is all I get; I have no interest in these mail transactions, but my master has; he is not here in this hour of peril, and I must protect him; they have asked me for my books; what, in the name of Heaven, shall I say. I do not want to commit perjury; or, whether the moral obligation is enough to restrain me or not, there stand the doors of the penitentiary ajar ready to receive me if I do. How shall I escape perjury and yet save my master? How shall I do it?" And he says he went to Brady and told him of the peril—a natural thing for him to do, but it is quite immaterial whether he did it or not. He went to Brady and told him of the peril, told him of the books he had. Brady said, "Why was Dorsey such a fool as to keep books?" and suggested to have the books copied and have the criminating entries left out. Whether that conversation occurred or not is immaterial. In my judgment, the circumstances confirm the fact that the conversation did occur. But whether he determined to have the books copied at the instigation of Brady, or whether he concluded to have the books copied on his own suggestion, in order to protect Dorsey from the peril with which those books threatened him, is immaterial. Enough, gentlemen, that he concluded to have them copied.

Donnelly was the friend of Dorsey, his intimate friend; he had been working for him; and although an office-holder, it was manifest to any one of you who watched him on the stand, that as I wrung the truth from his bosom it came followed by his tears. He kept the books late in the spring of 1880. He had first seen those books in 1879. How came he to see them in 1879?

Q. Under what circumstances did you see it—

The book that he kept—in the summer of 1879?—A. Mr. Rerdell called me in to examine a set of books for him and straighten them out.

Q. What did you do in consequence of that call from him?—A. I straightened them out—balanced them. [Pages. 2636, 2637.]

His testimony shows that this was done in August, 1879. Rerdell, having opened the books in April, 1879, had had managed to get them confused, tangled, and goes to Donnelly, an experienced book-keeper, and friend of Dorsey's—he goes to Donnelly, because he was Dorsey's friend, and his friendship is shown by the borrowing of money and the notes—and asks him to straighten out those books. Donnelly takes the matter in hand in 1879, and straightens them out. Donnelly first saw the books in 1879, and after that he kept the books, assisting Rerdell, making entries in the books from memoranda furnished by Rerdell, and was paid by Rerdell out of Dorsey's money, as I claim, $25 a month for keeping those books.

Now, what was the next important transaction of Donnelly in connection with those books? The copying of them in 1880. He describes the books as a set of small books, covered with red morocco leather, a journal and a ledger, bearing that inscription on the outside, the contents relating to mail business. They had a number of names and accounts in them, to wit, "S. W. Dorsey, Mr. Rerdell, mail account, expense account, profit and loss account, J. W. Dorsey account, Donnelly's own account, William Smith account, and others." Donnelly kept those books from the fall of 1879 to the spring of 1880, when he made the copy. He describes the outside of the books that came to him in 1879, and he describes the inside of the books; he gives the kind of cover and style of the books, all agreeing with Rerdell's statement in reference to them; the contents of the books all agreeing with Rerdell's statement in reference to them. Donnelly knew the contents; he had looked at them time and again in 1879 and 1880, and he had made entries in them time and again. Now, in 1880 he is told to make a copy. What sort of a copy was he to make? Let us see what he says upon that subject. At page 2637 I asked him:

Q. Was it an exact copy of the book 1—A. It was not.

Q. What was left out?

He left out some accounts by Rerdell's direction; there were pencil marks drawn through to show what accounts were to be left out.

Q. What accounts did you leave out?

He left out the William Smith account, which was for about $30,000. So also says Rerdell—William Smith personating Thomas J. Brady, and that account was for about $30,000. So says Donnelly; and that in making the false copy by Rerdell's direction he left out the William Smith account, because that was the tell-tale that would have brought run upon Dorsey.

He says two or three other accounts were left out, carried to profit and loss, and the books balanced. He worked, he says, on those books two evenings and all of one night, "from sundown to sunrise." Why did he sit up all night to make those books? Does a man work all night as a matter of amusement? Was there not some emergency pressing upon him to work all night? Ay, gentlemen. What was that emergency? Rerdell had been summoned, as he says, to appear before the investigating committee and bring these books. Rerdell had pleaded sickness, was pretending to be sick, in order that he might get time to have the false copies made, which false copies he could take up and throw on the table of the committee and say, "There are the books you have called for; there are S. W. Dorsey's books; turn over the leaves and find any criminating entries if you can." He could not play sick more than a few days, and therefore says he to Donnelly, "Work evenings; sit up all night; let me have the copies speedily; danger is coming; the wolf is at the door; and lo, I must be ready to protect the household of my master."

What further does Donnelly say to confirm Rerdell?

I bought books to copy in as near like the others as possible.

He took the originals, their color and size, and he says he went to Adams' bookstore and bought two others as near like them as he could get. What more did he do? He made balance-sheets at that time. So far for the copying of the books. Now for the balance-sheets. I believe the balance-sheet was the shroud in which the oratorical undertaker wrapped Rerdell, and I believe he wrapped him up after he put him in the coffin. He made a balance-sheet to see that the books were right. He says, "I made the balance-sheet about the 20th of September, 1879; I also made a balance-sheet for the quarter ending December 31, 1879." That was the balance-sheet needed by Dorsey in New York when he was there making his arrangements with Bosler. That was the balance-sheet that was there. We had no confirmation of the fact of its presence there, but there is the proof of its creation here. At the end of that quarter he made a balance-sheet for the quarter ending December 31.

And that, gentlemen, is Donnelly's testimony in full. That was all of it. Cross-examination changed no part of it. There it stands boldly out. Unless Donnelly is guilty of perjury, unless he is one of the many men that Mr. Ingersoll proposed to kill and succeeded in killing, the proof is strong and conclusive, and confirmatory of Rerdell's statements about those books. Too many witnesses, gentlemen, have to be destroyed by the defendants. Mr. Ingersoll says, "Take Rerdell and Moore out of the case and there is nothing left." Take them out; there is plenty left. Take out every witness there is, and, standing upon the record alone there is plenty left. Take out Rerdell and take out Moore wherever they stand alone, but you cannot break down the proof which corroborates their testimony. You must take out Donnelly also, for Donnelly swears to the existence of those books, and swears that he kept them from 1879 to the early spring of 1880, and copied them in the late spring or early summer of 1880, and that they contained the William Smith account showing that he had received some thirty thousand dollars.

What else, gentlemen of the jury, have we about those books? They are not to be got rid of by a sneer, or a trope, or a metaphor. Charles E. Gibbs (page 2643) says that "Rerdell asked me and Mrs. Gibbs to do some work on some books for him between Christmas, 1879, and March, 1880." Next, he says he indexed three letter-books—the indexes that we asked to be allowed to see, but which they would not show us. The index would have shown the letter of Dorsey to Bosler, in 1879, giving him an account of the condition of the routes and how much percentage was to be paid to Brady. The indexes would have shown the letter of Rerdell to Bosler telling him of his trouble about those books in 1880. All pointed to the fact that such letters were sent, and thus confirmed Rerdell in his statement. No, gentlemen, we could not see the indexes for the reason that criminating testimony was in the indexes, and it was the duty of the counsel, knowing it to be so, to keep them out of court, as it would have been his highest obligation, if the indexes had not shown such criminating evidence, to bring them into court. I say that if those indexes and those check-stubs did not show criminating facts, and counsel examined them, they were false to their duty when they failed to present them to the jury on my demand. If they did show criminating evidence, their course may be regarded as wise and proper.

"Rerdell asked me and Mrs. Gibbs to do some work on some books for him between Christmas, 1879, and March, 1880. I indexed three letter-books, and Mrs. Gibbs"—Did what? Copied a journal. He had occasion for another copy of those genuine books. What was the journal about? The journal was on star route business. "Mrs. Gibbs made a copy, and I verified it." What accounts were in the books? M. C. Rerdell had an account there, S. W. Dorsey, John W. Dorsey, Mr. Steele all had accounts there; it was shown to you that Steele was an agent of Dorsey's, and had an account with him in regard to mail matters; Mr. Smith had an account there, and Jones and others. Now, he is asked, on page 2646 :

Have you any doubt about your recollection of the name of Smith?—A. Not the slightest.

As one of the parties on that book; and yet Dorsey swears he had no account with any Smith on the face of the earth. Those were the same books that Donnelly had copied, and now Gibbs comes in to confirm Donnelly. Why did you not call his wife, Mr. Merrick? you may ask. Gibbs says she copied them.

The COURT. Donnelly did not copy those books until after that.

Mr. BLISS. He kept them before.

Mr. MERRICK. Between Christmas, 1879, and March, 1880. Donnelly did not copy them until the spring or summer of 1880. Donnelly was in a public office, and, as you see, when he came to copy them in the summer of 1880, had a good deal of trouble to perform the undertaking; had to sit up all night to do it; had only a short time in which to do it; and, therefore, Mr. Rerdell got Mr. Gibbs, who was not so busily employed, to make the first copy, which was a true and correct one. Donnelly had then been keeping the books.

The COURT. No; at that time Donnelly had had no connection with those books.

Mr. MERRICK. No; pardon me. You did not probably catch what I said, that in August, 1879, Rerdell took the books to Donnelly to straighten them out, and then Donnelly afterwards kept them for Rerdell.

The COURT. Until the spring of 1880.

Mr. MERRICK. Until the spring of 1880; but this transaction relates to a period between—

The COURT. [Interposing.] 1879 and 1880.

Mr. MERRICK. No, no; beginning about January 1879, and extending to March, 1880.

Mr. BLISS. No, I think you are wrong; it was Christmas, 1879, and March, 1880.

Mr. MERRICK. Christmas, 1879, and March, 1880.

The COURT. I did not understand. I thought you said from January, 1879, to March, 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir.

Now, you may ask why I did not call Mrs. Gibbs. I always consider it, gentlemen, an exceedingly delicate thing for a lawyer to put a lady upon the witness-stand, and I never do it unless I am obliged. Not because, as some might think, they will have their own way, but because it is a delicate thing to do. But I gave you my reason when Gibbs was on the stand. You remember I asked him about the condition of his wife. She was sick, and had lately lost an infant. Her nerves were broken down, her body weakened, and he thought it would be perilous to bring her here. That was enough for me. For me there is nothing more sacred on this earth than a woman in distress.

Further upon the subject of these books, Mrs. Cushman was living in Rerdell's house in 1881, after the affidavit of 1881. Rerdell went West, and he wrote to Mrs. Cushman to look for that book and get it and take care of it, and Mrs. Cushman testifies that she did so, and identified the book.

Now, what further in confirmation of Donnelly? Torrey is writing up some books in New York. He cannot make them balance. This was in 1880, I think. He is writing up some of the books of Kellogg for Dorsey in 1880. What does Torrey do when he cannot make them balance? He writes to Rerdell. Why does he write to Rerdell about Dorsey's books? He has some books there which he is balancing and he cannot make them balance. What does Rerdell? Rerdell goes to Donnelly, who had kept these books, and they look over these books, and they find that the difficulty is whether a certain item was 25 cents or $25. Donnelly and Rerdell made out the correct record, they being the original book-keepers, and sent it on to Mr. Torrey. Torrey, who, Dorsey swears, was his book-keeper, cannot balance the book without the help of Rerdell and Donnelly, and he gets that help and does balance the books.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, let me ask you one simple question, addressing it to your common sense. Do you believe that in 1879, when Donnelly first saw those books—for I have now conclusively proved their existence—Rerdell was then preparing testimony to destroy Dorsey? For, if this is true, that those books existed in 1879, that the account of William Smith was in those books, and that he was there credited with $30,000, then it is true that in 1879, when Rerdell made those entries in that book, or caused them to be made, he was preparing testimony to destroy his master, unless the entries were made, as Rerdell says they were, by Dorsey's direction, and to conceal Thomas J. Brady under the name of Wm. Smith. Do you believe Rerdell was then laying so deep and infamous a plan? It is not enough to say that he is faithless now; it is not enough to say that he may have done this yesterday or last summer when he was thinking of coming over to the Government and asking mercy for his crimes; it is not enough to do that. You must go back to 1879, and say that the demon of malice, ill-will, and hatred, had entered his heart then, and that his brain was then designing and scheming to create false testimony to be used in 1883 to destroy Dorsey. And yet, from that day, 1879, down to the last trial of this case, this poor, debauched creature, Montfort C. Rerdell, followed at the heels of Dorsey like a faithful dog, doing his bidding in every crime that could put money in his master's pocket. Tell me that this man, who had done those things in 1879 and since, had conceived the design of preparing the nitro-glycerine which, on the first day of December, 1882, when this trial began, was to explode and destroy his master! It is ridiculous. No ornamental rhetoric can even make it respectable and decent.

I have said to you—and you will agree with me—that if you find the existence of the books and the existence of the entries in the books, then the memorandum is proved, because the entry in the book is the shadow, the memorandum is the substance, and the shadow could not have been cast until the substance had come into existence. There is something very peculiar about that memorandum.

Allow me to ask you to consider, for a moment, the statements of Kellogg and Torrey in reference to the kind of books they kept. Who kept Dorsey's mail account if Rerdell did not? Kellogg says, on cross-examination, at page 3651, that in the spring and summer of 1879 he kept Dorsey's books while Dorsey was in the Senate; he acted as his private secretary; kept all his accounts; did not keep his mining accounts, but kept his ranch accounts; kept all his books; had a mail account in the books which was a small account; knew that Rerdell had charge of Dorsey's mail business, and he (Kellogg) had nothing to do with it (page 3652). Had nothing at all to do with it except to make a few entries; could not tell the dates at which the entries were made, nor the year. Rerdell was looking after those mail contracts of Dorsey; he never interfered with his business at all, or inquired anything about it; he knew nothing whatever about the routes in which Dorsey was interested; had nothing to do with the mail business; that was in Rerdell's charge. Such was Kellogg's statement.

What does Torrey, the other book-keeper, say, at page 3617? He knew that Rerdell was acting with Dorsey, because Rerdell came to New York with a check-book on Middleton & Co., and made some checks there. Rerdell took the check-book to Washington. This was in February, 1880. He was there in March, 1880, with the check-book. He remembered writing but one letter about the little matter of 25 cents or $25. As I told you just now, he wrote to Rerdell because he could not balance the books. He wrote up Dorsey's books from certain books that he had there, and from the books that Rerdell brought to the office, and found that there was a difficulty in reference to an item as to whether it was 25 cents or $25. He says it was after February 7, 1880, that he wrote; cannot tell whether it arose from something else than the account in the check-book (page 3618.) Don't know whether Rerdell kept any books or not (page 3621). On page 3623 he says: The first entry he ever made in the books in relation to mail was February, 1880; did not keep the account of John W. Steele with Dorsey; that was a mail account. Did not keep any account with Rerdell on the books; that was a mail account. Did not keep any account with Reeside; that was a mail account. Did not keep any account with any of the men employed by Dorsey in the mail business. "THE MAIL BUSINESS WAS ENTIRELY OUT OF MY PROVINCE." The books of Kellogg that he balanced referred to the ranch accounts and personal accounts of Dorsey, and referred to nothing else, gentlemen of the jury.

Now, take it and make the most of it. You have the existence of the books conclusively proved by Donnelly and Gibbs. You have the fact from Kellogg that he kept a very small mail account. You have the fact from Torrey that he kept no mail account, as I have read to you; that mail matters were under Rerdell's control. And that Kellogg's accounts related merely to ranch matters and personal accounts, and nothing else.

Now, gentlemen, here is this famous memorandum (31 X), about which I say there has been some talk. Mr. Kellogg says he thinks he has seen the first part of this memorandum before, and that that part of it was in Dorsey's handwriting, down to "profit and loss," if I mistake not; the last part in his opinion is not. Now, gentlemen, will you please compare the "S" at the beginning of "S. W. D." in the first line, with the "S" at the beginning of the last line?

Mr. CARPENTER. Do I understand you to say that Torrey kept no mail account?

Mr. MERRICK. I think Mr. Torrey says that he kept no mail account. I will read to you what he says, as I read it to the jury a moment ago.

Mr. CARPENTER. On page 3600, and—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Allow me to read it. You asked me a question, and I will answer it.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wanted to give you a reference to the page.

Mr. MERRICK. The first entry he ever made in the books in relation to mail was in February, 1880.

Mr. CARPENTER. Who?

Mr. MERRICK. Torrey. Did not keep the account of Steele with Dorsey; did not keep any account with Rerdell. Both of those were mail accounts. Did not keep any account with Reeside, another mail account. Did not keep any account with any of the men employed by Dorsey in the mail business. "The mail business was entirely out of my province." The books of Kellogg that he balanced referred to ranch accounts and personal accounts of Dorsey, and referred to nothing else.

Mr. CARPENTER. Very well; now on page 3600, and——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] May it please your honor, I object to going into any controversy whilst I am engaged in closing the case.

The COURT. [To Mr. Carpenter.] Do you say that Mr. Merrick has misstated it?

Mr. CARPENTER. I say that Mr. Merrick says that Mr. Torrey says he did not keep mail accounts. I say he did.

Mr. MERRICK. I have just read it, which shows that what you state is not correct.

Mr. CARPENTER. He won't allow me to correct him.

Mr. MERRICK. Allow me to read.

The COURT. No; I will not. Mr. Merrick, stop.

Mr. MERRICK. I have just read it.

The COURT. [To Mr. Carpenter.] Mr. Merrick has not misstated the evidence, according to your own admission. You do not rise for the purpose of correcting any misstatement. You rise for the purpose of bringing to his attention some other piece of evidence.

Mr. CARPENTER. Not at all.

The COURT. And that is inadmissible.

Mr. CARPENTER. He has stated distinctly that Mr. Torrey says he did not keep the mail account. Torrey says he did.

Mr. MERRICK. I read from Mr. Torrey's testimony where he said that the mail business was entirely out of his province.

The COURT. You cannot bring in any other evidence. If Mr. Merrick has misstated any piece of evidence he is liable to correction. But under the guise of correcting him you have no right to introduce evidence on your side of the question.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not. I simply want to read what he said.

Mr. MERRICK. Haven't I read correctly what he said?

Mr. CARPENTER. No, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. Turn to the page. I say this is correct. It was copied precisely from his testimony.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not propose to quote it.

The COURT. I want to know whether Mr. Carpenter says that Mr. Merrick has misread it.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do say that Mr. Merrick said that Torrey kept no mail account, and Torrey says he did.

Mr. MERRICK. Have I misread the evidence? Turn to the page. I say it is exactly as I read. May it please your honor, turn to the page of the record. I read from a paper. I say that Torrey says that the first charge he made to mail account was in February, 1880.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the court please, I am not quarreling with that. Mr. Merrick stated to the jury that Mr. Torrey said he kept no mail account. I say that Torrey says he did.

Mr. MERRICK. Very well; let him read it; I consent; let us get on.

Mr. CARPENTER. I read from page 3619:

Q. Were there any other accounts in those books except those in relation to mining ranches, and railroads?—A. There was a mail account.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, sir, will you turn to the next page, the very next question, and see whether I misrepresented the evidence?

Mr. CARPENTER. Not at all.

Mr. MERRICK. The very next question is:

Q. Did you keep that?—A. I entered up the twenty-eight or thirty checks that Rerdell drew, and charged them to mail account.

Mr. CARPENTER. You corrected Mr. Ingersoll when he was making his argument, but you object to any correction of yours.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; I object to being unnecessarily interrupted, and above all I object——

The COURT. [Interposing.] It seems to me that this matter is perfectly plain.

Mr. CARPENTER. I suppose the defendants have some rights.

The COURT. Torrey says, on page 3612, that the books he kept there were what were called the new books.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes. He did not begin to keep the books until January, 1880.

Mr. BLISS. And the statement is that Rerdell came over there at one time and drew some twenty-eight or thirty checks, and these are the checks he says he entered up.

The COURT. That is the evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. That is the evidence. He kept no mail account except that.

Mr. CARPENTER. He says he did.

Mr. MERRICK. Such a degree of perversity about it is not the result of a mistake. It is willful.

I have given the jury the pencil memorandum and asked them to look at the "S's." Look at the first "S" in the name of S. W. Dorsey, and at the "S" in the name Smith and see if they are not alike. Gentlemen, it does not often happen that you can find a proper name in two papers that you are comparing; but if you look in 18 X, which is in Dorsey's handwriting, and look at the word "Smith" after "Fort," you will see the likeness. I think, gentlemen, you will observe that those two Smiths belong to the same family.

[After a pause, while the jury examined the papers.]

Now, gentlemen, I want you to compare the word "expense" in the memorandum with the word "expensive" in the letter 30 S, which is just in the middle of the line, and with the words "extended" and "exclusive" in 40 and 41 F. I call attention to the peculiar formation of the "E." It is a Greek "E," and the "x" is just a cross. I call your attention also to the loop of the "p."

Mr. BLISS. 40 and 41 F are the two drafts in pencil of petitions forwarded by Dorsey to Anthony Joseph. 30 S is a letter transmitting an oath on route 38113, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. MERRICK. Gentlemen, I now show you 3 T. Look at the letter "S" in the "Second Assistant." It is the same peculiar "S."

[The jury here examined papers submitted to them, after which:]

Mr. MERRICK. It is now 1 o'clock, your honor. I find I have been somewhat delayed, and if it is not disagreeable to your honor I must force my own strength and proceed after recess, unless the jury should wish to be discharged for the rest of the day. I do not want to protract my argument beyond to-morrow by any possibility, if I can help it.

The COURT. I hope not.

Mr. MERRICK. That is sufficient to make it certain.

The COURT. We will take our recess now, gentlemen.

At this point (1 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

The COURT. I did not intend, Mr. Merrick, to be understood in the remark I made just before recess that the court was tired of hearing you; but only that for your own sake I hoped you might be able to close your speech to-morrow.

Mr. MERRICK. I did not understand the remark in any other way. I am a little fatigued, your honor, but I will force my strength and endeavor to get through by to-morrow. Certainly I want to get through.

The COURT. You have had a great deal of work to do, and whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well. I do not want to curtail you.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court and gentlemen of the jury: I shall trespass upon you a little further to ask from you a closer examination of the pencil memorandum in connection with other papers of S. W. Dorsey's, premising, however, the suggestion that you will bear in mind what Torrey says as to keeping the books, and that he only entered the checks drawn by Rerdell, and kept no mail accounts. Kellogg kept a very small mail account. What that was we do not know. None of the books were brought in. You will observe that there is upon the memorandum a direction to open accounts with S. W. Dorsey and with John W. Dorsey and J. M. Peck for cash loaned, an expense account and a cash account. Those items are all conclusively shown to be in Dorsey's handwriting. A doubt arises from profit and loss down to the end of the memorandum. Now, there was an expense account and a cash account shown in Rerdell's book, and there were no accounts similar to those shown in any other book connected with the mail transactions. It is therefore apparent (and although disputed, it is uncontradicted) that Dorsey ordered an expense and cash account opened somewhere, and that both accounts were in Rerdell's book.

Now, gentlemen, take the memorandum and look at the "M. C. R.," and compare the formation of the letters "M. C. R." in that memorandum with the letters "M. C. R." here [exhibiting another paper].

Mr. INGERSOLL. What paper are you showing?

Mr. MERRICK. I am showing now 34 X. That is a letter which Dorsey says he wrote to Paddock.

The COURT. A letter of introduction.

Mr. MERRICK. This is one of the letters of introduction. You will see the hand, in making those letters, follows the same course from the point of initiation to the close.

Mr. GREENE (a juror). These comparisons are extremely confusing to me. We were shown this memorandum by Mr. Ingersoll for the purpose of comparison. As far as I am concerned, as I am not an expert, I am confused by the comparisons.

The COURT. There is no dispute about the first three items.

Mr. MERRICK. There is no dispute about those, I believe. Now, gentlemen, here is 18 X, which is the letter to Clendenning. The "R" in that, you see, is exactly the same as the "R" in the memorandum. I am showing these papers merely to prove by comparison that that memorandum is in Dorsey's handwriting; but the proof outside of this comparison, which is stronger and better, is that I have shown the books to exist and to contain the shadow of this very memorandum. The books were made up from this memorandum.

[A pause here ensued while the jury compared the papers.]

Mr. MERRICK. Now, gentlemen, I will trouble you with one more, although I hold a number of them in my hand. I propose to show you 83 X, which is another letter to Clendenning, and to show you 39 F.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What is 39 F ?

Mr. MERRICK. A letter to Joseph, written from Kansas City.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think that was written by a shorthand reporter.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes ; but it contains a postscript in Dorsey's own hand. I am going to show them the postscript.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is right.

Mr. MERRICK. I show you these two letters, gentlemen, and ask you to observe the "D's" in them, and at the same time compare them with the two "D's" in the disputed part of the memorandum. I think you will say beyond all question that Dorsey made the four "D's." The same hand made them all beyond the possibility of a doubt.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). The handwriting in these letters is different. [Indicating two letters.]

Mr. MERRICK. Dorsey says they are both his.

The FOREMAN. Then he writes two hands.

Mr. MERRICK. I think he does write two or three hands. That is a fair conclusion. I think it is quite plain that he does.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the court please, I do not know any evidence of that kind. We admit that the pencil memorandum resembles Dorsey's handwriting or else it would not have been much of a forgery.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Boone swears as to two papers that they are in Dorsey's handwriting, disguised.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The point as to the memorandum is : How does it come to resemble Rerdell's handwriting ?

Mr. MERRICK. I understand that. That is no point. The question is : How does it come to resemble Dorsey's handwriting ?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No ; It resembles Dorsey's because it is a forgery. The question is : How does it come to resemble Rerdell's handwriting ?

Mr. MERRICK. If Rerdell was attempting to cheat and could imitate Dorsey's handwriting he would not make a memorandum that would resemble his own.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He certainly would make one that resembled Dorsey's, but he slipped up on the "M. C. R."

Mr. MERRICK. If he was intending to cheat he would not make one that resembled his.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He happened to.

Mr. MERRICK. Well ; I will not present any more papers to you, gentlemen. It is not necessary. From what I have said in reference to the accounts in the books the subject-matter is quite conclusive. I am through with the papers. I want his honor to look at them. [Papers exhibited to court.]

I will now pass on to Rerdell's visit to New York. After his interviews with the officers of the Government he went, on the 12th day of June, 1881, according to the evidence, if I am not mistaken, to New York for the purpose of obtaining these red books. He found Mr. James on the cars on his way to New York. Arriving in the city of New York on Monday morning he went to the Albemarle Hotel. It is not necessary to follow him up one street and down another, and I do not care to do so especially as the prosecution were not allowed to introduce evidence in that regard which they offered. Of course that is not a subject of comment. At the Albemarle Hotel he met Dorsey. He had a conversation with Dorsey at the Albemarle Hotel which is in part detailed by both of them, but not with any very great precision. Rerdell says of the interview, on page 2281 :

On going up to his room I found Dorsey in bed. As soon as I got in he got up. I saw that he was very much excited as soon as he saw me. He immediately commenced saying that I had turned traitor to him, and that I had been holding interviews with the Postmaster-General and with the Attorney-General.

That is a fact. He had been holding interviews with the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General.

I cannot give all he said, because I became very much excited as well as he. He was furious. I left the room. As I was going out of the room he said to me, "I wish you would come back here as soon as I get dressed, in a little while." Without replying I left and did not return to his room any more.

That is Rerdell's account of his interview with Dorsey. Dorsey's representation of that interview is that it was as calm as a summer's morning; that they parted in perfect amity; no furious exhibition of passion, no existence of passion. He asked Rerdell why he had left his post without letting him know, I believe. Who tells the truth in reference to the character of that interview? Gentlemen, that can only be determined by the subsequent circumstances developed in the case. Dorsey heard no more of Rerdell from that time forth until on the evening of that day he received a telegram from him dated in Jersey City. Dorsey's statement of the contents of the telegram will be found on page 3789:

Q. Do you remember what the telegram contained—have you any memory of it?—
A. I can remember the substance of it, I think.

Q. Well?—A. I think he says: The affidavit story is a lie. Confidence is lost between us. I have been faithful to every trust, but I now resign my place. Send somebody to take charge of the books.

Rerdell's statement in reference to the telegram does not very materially differ from this and will be found on page 2284. He says the telegram was as follows:

The affidavit story is a lie, but all confidence between us is gone. I resign my position and will turn everything over to any one you may designate.

They differ in their statement of the contents of this telegram only in one particular. That particular is, that Dorsey says the telegram contained these words:

I have been faithful to every trust, but I now resign my place.

Rerdell omits the words, "faithful to every trust," but states in his evidence that he wrote three or four telegrams before sending one, having tried in thus writing three or four to get one to suit him. One contained the expression which Dorsey says was in the telegram he received; but Rerdell says it was not in the telegram he sent. Rerdell said nothing in his telegram about books. He said:

I resign my position and will turn over everything to any one you designate.

Dorsey says the telegram stated:

Send somebody to take charge of the books.

Thereby betraying himself by a reference to the books. Now, in reference to the interview at the Albemarle Hotel, having read you what Rerdell said, I will read you what Dorsey said, on page 3789:

You may state whether you had any conversation with him at that time; and, if so, what it was.—A. I do not know that I could repeat the conversation that I had with him. He came in there, about as he says, early in the morning. I had had an intimation the night before that Rerdell was engaged in some scheme with the Government, but did not know what it was. He came in and began to tell me what Salisbury and Parker and other people were going to do, and advised me to come back to Washington. I had left here, you understand, intending to go out to my ranch and not come back at all. I had got through, and was there settling up my business. I told him I did not want to come back here; that I did not want anything to do with it; that I was amazed that he had left his post—his business—to come over there without any knowledge on my part, as he had not written or telegraphed me about it. I told him to go out and get his breakfast and come back and I would talk with him. There was no bitterness of feeling. I told him I had had an intimation that he was doing something in connection with the Government, but he denied it vehemently. He said it was untrue, all a lie, and so on. I, of course, told him I believed that, and I did believe it perfectly. He went off and said he would be back in an hour or two, as soon as he got breakfast. The next I heard of him he was in Jersey City; he did not come back at all.

Q. Have you given about the substance of the conversation?—A. Yes; the substance. I do not remember it distinctly, but that is about what it was. There was nothing like rage manifested on my part or his.

Subsequently Dorsey says that in that conversation no affidavit was mentioned or spoken of. Now, those being the opposing statements in reference to the interview, let us see which is true by the light of what immediately followed the interview. According to Dorsey, they parted good friends. According to Dorsey he had no impression on his mind that Rerdell had any idea of communicating with the Government. Rerdell had dispelled that idea. According to Dorsey's statement not one word was said about an affidavit. According to Rerdell's statement quite a different kind of interview took place. Dorsey had charged him with making communications to the Government, and became enraged, and then Rerdell left. When Rerdell reached Jersey City, according to Dorsey's statement, he sent Dorsey a telegram. Dorsey says the very first words of that telegram were as follows:

The affidavit story is a lie.

What affidavit story? In his conversation with Dorsey that morning the word affidavit had not been breathed, as Dorsey swears. Not one word was said about an affidavit; and yet the very first words Rerdell sends to Dorsey, after leaving his room, were words manifestly in continuation of a discussion about an affidavit.

The affidavit story is a lie.

What affidavit story? "The affidavit story that you have been discussing with me. The affidavit story that you and I were quarreling about. It is a lie."

Mr. INGERSOLL. Does Rerdell swear that there was anything said about an affidavit?

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; no, sir. He says that Dorsey accused him of having had communications with the Government. He cannot repeat the conversation, but he says it was angry, and Dorsey became enraged.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There was nothing about an affidavit.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; but it is plain. Dorsey, on the contrary, swears that nothing was said about an affidavit. Rerdell was not interrogated specifically upon the subject. But from what Rerdell does state, and the subsequent circumstances, it is plain that the affidavit was the subject of discussion and Dorsey falsely swears it was not.

The affidavit story is a lie.

What does that mean? "The affidavit story that you and I have been quarreling about this morning." Dorsey says they quit good friends, calm as a summer's morning, as I have said. Rerdell says they quit in anger. What next? Says Rerdell to this man whom he had left, to his master to whom he had been clinging through all the vicissitudes of their crimes—

Confidence between us is lost.

Was that the language of a man who had quit another in peace and good temper and love and amity? Was it not rather the language of a man who had left a room where there had been an angry quarrel and where there had been either manifested, or avowed, a condition of things that looked to a permanent separation between them? Why was confidence between them lost? Why should Rerdell hurl this back, after a peaceable, amiable, and friendly talk:

The affidavit story is a lie. Confidence between us is lost. I have been faithful to every trust, but now resign my place.

Why telegraph from Jersey City, "I now resign my place," if all had been amicable and peaceful and pleasant that morning? "This declaration of my resigning is in consequence of what has occurred to-day. You have questioned me. You have questioned my truth and my sincerity in reference to your interests. Confidence between us is gone. We have parted in anger. Friendship is dead. I resign my place. Send on somebody to take charge of the books." So says Rerdell according to Dorsey. What books? The books that Rerdell was keeping as Dorsey's clerk.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Rerdell swears those books were in New York.

Mr. MERRICK. May it please your honor, may I proceed without interruption?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Was that an unfair interruption?

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly; if I make a misstatement you may interrupt me.

The COURT. If you misstate a fact.

Mr. MERRICK. But I have not done so. Counsel has been very courteous and I will reciprocate with great pleasure, but I do not think he has a right to interrupt me in the course of my argument to interpose suggestions controverting my course of reasoning.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, I would not do that; but this is the point I was about to make: Mr. Rerdell swears that the red books were in New York.

Mr. MERRICK. Is not that an argument?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, no. Mr. Dorsey swears that when he received the dispatch from Rerdell there was in it, "Send some one to take charge of the books." I understand Mr. Merrick to say that the books there referred to were the red books.

Mr. MERRICK. Is that correcting me?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask if the evidence is not that those red books were in New York.

Mr. MERRICK. Is that correcting me?

The COURT. No.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly it is not, and the counsel knows it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No; I do not know it.

Mr. MERRICK. Pardon me. I object to being interrupted in that way even by one so courteous as the counsel has been since the argument commenced.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to your saying that I knew.

Mr. MERRICK. You must have known. I give you credit for a great deal of knowledge.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No. I insist that the court is wrong in that decision, but of course, I submit to it.

Mr. MERRICK. Says Mr. Dorsey:

Send somebody to take charge of the books.

Dorsey says this whole matter was in the hands of Rerdell. Dorsey knew that Rerdell ought to have been the custodian of those books. He may not have known where the books were. Wherever Dorsey was pressed as to the affidavits filed in the department on any of the routes, or with regard to other matters relating to the mail business, he said, "I don't know whether I wrote it or not, because this whole thing was in Rerdell's hands, and I knew nothing about it." Dorsey says that the telegram spoke of "the books." Rerdell says the telegram did not refer to books. Rerdell knew where the books were. Rerdell says his telegram was :

Send somebody to take charge of the business.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Do you claim that Rerdell telegraphed Dorsey to send somebody to take charge of the books that he, Rerdell, had stolen?

Mr. MERRICK. May it please your honor, may I proceed?

The COURT. The evidence——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] May I proceed?

The COURT. Certainly. The evidence was that——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I know it hurts, but still I must go on.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is too absurd to hurt.

Mr. MERRICK. I have been sweeping away absurdity.

The COURT. Dorsey says that the request was that Dorsey should send somebody to take charge of the books. Whatever Mr. Merrick can make out of that by way of argument is proper.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask him if he claims that Rerdell intended to have Dorsey send somebody to take charge of a book that Rerdell had stolen.

The COURT. You will see after a while.

Mr. MERRICK. Rerdell says he telegraphed to Dorsey to send some one to take charge of the business, not the books. Dorsey says that the telegram was to send some one to take charge of the books. I do not believe Dorsey told the truth. I think the telegram was "Send somebody to take charge of the business." But Dorsey's mind was on the books, and he, therefore, testified that such was the telegram, and thus betrayed himself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Rerdell had the route-book.

Mr. MERRICK. I must again say to the court that I protest against these unbecoming interruptions.

The COURT. Go on, Mr. Merrick; go on.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, I will go out and take a smoke.

Mr. MERRICK. I think that will probably do you some good, especially as you have given us so much smoke during the argument.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not think any shot has been thrown that has penetrated that smoke.

Mr. MERRICK. No; smoke cannot be penetrated!!

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, yes, it can. Perhaps my kind cannot.

Mr. MERRICK. I think the counsel will find himself easier outside, although I would be glad to have him here during my argument.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, according to Rerdell's testimony he went into Torrey's office during his stay in New York and took possession of that red book. Coming on, he brought the book with him. He met Mr. James in the car and said to Mr. James, "Here is the book." He had a little sachel. Counsel say what he had in his lap was a shirt. The sachel was too small for the book, but amply large enough to carry the shirt. However, let me not be led off from the line of the argument. I am now seeking to show you that S. W. Dorsey was guilty of perjury when he stated on the stand the substance of that interview at the Albemarle Hotel. I will show you first, by the telegram which he says he received from Rerdell, that such a telegram from one of the parties to the conversation, if the conversation was as Dorsey details it to be, was an impossibility. What next? The instant Dorsey receives that telegram he follows Rerdell on the wings of the lightning. He sends him a telegram to be delivered on the road at Philadelphia or Trenton. He sends him a second telegram to be delivered on the road at Philadelphia or Trenton. He writes him a letter that night, and although he does these things and thus pursues Rerdell in his anxiety and fear, he tells you he was not apprehensive and made no arrangement for meeting or overcoming the difficulties that were coming upon him from Rerdell's going over to the Government. Rerdell tells you the contents of that letter, and there again he and Dorsey are directly at issue. Neither of them can tell you the contents of the telegrams sent to be delivered along the road. We offered to prove their contents by Mr. James, but the testimony was ruled out. It is not subject-matter for me to comment upon. The telegrams were in reply to the telegram from Rerdell, saying that he had resigned, and directing Dorsey to send somebody to take charge of the books. If Dorsey had accepted that resignation and apprehended no danger from Rerdell, surely he would not have pursued him with two telegrams and a letter. It is reasonable to infer that the two telegrams and the letter, sent under those circumstances within a few hours of each other, were papers containing some sort of a petition to Rerdell either not to do what he had threatened, or to wait and consult with Dorsey.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Merrick, there is no evidence that the telegrams sent were in reply to the one sent by Rerdell.

The COURT. The evidence was that two telegrams were received.

Mr. BLISS. And that he sent them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But there is no evidence that those telegrams were in reply to Rerdell's.

Mr. MERRICK. There is evidence, may it please your honor, in this way——

The COURT. [Interposing.] There is this evidence only——

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] Dorsey swears distinctly that he sent two telegrams in reply.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not in reply.

Mr. BLISS. In reply.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No.

The COURT. The telegrams were sent after Dorsey received Rerdell's telegram, and whilst Rerdell was on the train, the same evening in which Rerdell had sent the telegram to Dorsey.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But the contents were not proved.

Mr. BLISS. I will read from page 3978 of Dorsey's testimony:

Q. Did you make any reply to that telegram?—A. I believe I did.

Q. In what form did you reply? By word of mouth, letter, or telegram?—A. By telegram, I think.

Q. Where was it addressed to?—A. My recollection is that it was addressed to Philadelphia.

Q. Did you send one or two telegrams?—A. I believe I sent two.

Q. Rerdell was not going to Philadelphia, was he?—A. He passed through there. According to his telegram he was going to Washington.

Q. Your telegram was not then sent to Philadelphia to be delivered in the city of Philadelphia, but was sent to Philadelphia to be delivered on the road, was it?—A. On the train.

Q. Two telegrams?—A. That is my recollection about it.

Q. On the same day?—A. Certainly, on the same day.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The contents were not established.

The COURT. No.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I was mistaken as to their not being in reply.

Mr. MERRICK. Then I think counsel had better go and take his smoke.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Wait a moment. Has the counsel a right to say what the contents were?

The COURT. I did not understand him to state the contents.

Mr. MERRICK. I have not said a word about the contents, except as I reason what those contents must have been.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understood him to say they were petitions.

Mr. MERRICK. I did. I said the only conclusion that could be drawn in reference to those papers, from the circumstances and the relation of the parties, was that they were petitions; that the contents were not in evidence by any witness, because the court would not allow us to prove the contents, and that was not a subject-matter upon which I could comment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. So you do not claim that there is any evidence that they were petitions?

Mr. MERRICK. Only from the circumstances.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well.

Mr. MERRICK. I have not said a word about them except that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is no evidence.

The COURT. Oh, no. He does not claim that.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If he does not claim there is anything in the evidence, I do not care.

Mr. MERRICK. There is nothing in the evidence directly as to their contents, but there is evidence from which any sensible man would conclude as to the general nature of the contents. That is all that I say. Why should Dorsey send one telegram? If he sent one why should he send two? Why should he follow them both with a letter? Why catch Rerdell at Philadelphia on the train? I say any sensible man will answer the question in this way: Those two telegrams were, "For God's sake, stop, and come back." Why pursue him on the train? He had announced that he would resign his place. He had asked Dorsey to send somebody to take charge of the business. In reply to that telegram one telegram is sent to intercept him on the train and another telegram is sent to intercept him on the train. Why not meet him in Washington, unless the object was to stop him half way with a view to his coming back to New York? Why not send those telegrams to Washington? For the simple and only conceivable reason that the design was that he should not touch the soil of Washington until Dorsey had him again in his clutches.

Now, gentlemen, he goes on and gets to Washington. I think a few days afterwards Dorsey arrived here. Dorsey had intended to go on West immediately. He had closed up his business in Washington and left to go West, but he returns to this city, and here at that time was made the affidavit of June, 1881. Let us see, gentlemen of the jury, who tells the truth about that affidavit. In the first place, Rerdell in his testimony says that he prepared a truthful and exact narrative of what had occurred between him and the Attorney-General and the Postmaster-General in reference to the subjects talked of between them and handed it to Dorsey, and that Dorsey took his narrative and interpolated in that narrative in different places throughout, until from the reading you will see that the entire sense and nature of the paper as Rerdell states it was originally written has been changed by Dorsey's interpolations. You will find, when you examine and reflect upon the character of Dorsey's interpolations, that they were all more or less upon the political features of the transaction. I will read from page 3781 of Mr. Dorsey's examination:

Q. I will ask you if you wrote these words as a part of the statement afterwards sworn to by Mr. Rerdell:

“Mr. PRESIDENT: I think it is my duty to you, the Administration, and common fairness that I should make to you the following statement under oath.”

Did you write that as a part of that statement, or furnish that sentence?—A. No, SIR.

Then the counsel read him another extract, and said:

I will ask you if you wrote that or any part of it?—A. No, sir.

So you will remember the counsel went on through the entire affidavit, taking up each particular word, line, and sentence which Rerdell said Dorsey had written and asked Dorsey if he wrote it, to all of which questions came a prompt and emphatic NO. Then, following the specific and detailed inquiry in reference to the different lines and sentences of the affidavit this examination took place:

Q. “The books referred to, Mr. MacVeagh understood to be the private books and accounts of Mr. Dorsey.

“His urging me repeatedly to obtain these books, substantially by stealing them from Mr. Dorsey's office in New York, alarmed me beyond measure. I could not believe it possible that the Attorney-General of the United States would advise and urge anybody to commit what in its very nature must have been the gravest of felonies, including both larceny and burglary.”

If Mr. Rerdell swears that you wrote or suggested that, you may tell the jury whether his statement is or is not true?—A. If Mr. Rerdell swears to that, it is a lie. I did not suggest it or write it.

Q. Then, is it your statement that ALL of this statement or affidavit of June 20th or 21st, 1881, was written, so far as you know, by M. C. Rerdell?—A. It was, so far as I know.

Q. Did you suggest any part of it?—A. NO PART OF IT; NO WORD IN IT.]

He neither wrote a word nor suggested a word. He speaks with positive emphasis and clear recollection:

Q. Did you suggest any part of it?—A. NO PART OF IT; NO WORD OF IT.

In his testimony in chief I may add that he produces the impression that the preparation of this affidavit was a matter of Rerdell's own suggestion entirely, and that he did nothing to prompt it. Indeed, the very next sentence to what I last read I might read to sustain this statement:

Q. Did you at that time say anything to him as to making it for the purpose of inducing him to make it?—A. No, sir.

He says it was not made at his suggestion at all, and he did not care much about it. He says, on page 3731:

It was not made at my suggestion, at my request, or by my direction in any way.

Now, let us turn to his cross-examination, for out of his own mouth I intend to convict him before this jury of either designedly trying to deceive them, or of being guilty of manifest perjury. I will read from page 3984:

Q. Were you anxious to get that affidavit?—A. Well, I thought it was a desirable thing to have.

Q. Was not the getting of that affidavit the means that you were taking to protect yourself against this man?—A. That would appear so after I became acquainted with the character of the man.

After swearing he had nothing to do with it he tells you on cross-examination that the getting of the affidavit was the means that he was taking to protect himself against that man after he had learned his character. He further said it was a desirable thing to have. Now, I will read in continuation, and I will read pretty largely, because as I am attacking him by using the words of his own mouth, he should have the benefit of all the words that came out of that mouth:

Q. Did you not revolve over in your mind some plan by which you were to protect yourself before you came on to Washington?—A. Oh, I had concocted no scheme.

Q. You had concocted no plan, but simply remained in anxiety without a plan as to what to do, did you?—A. I do not know about the anxiety. I don't think I was very anxious.

Q. Did you expect to meet Mr. Bosler here?—A. I think I did.

How came he to expect to meet Bosler here? He had finished his business. He had nothing here left to do. He was going West. He says he expected to meet Bosler here. Why? Had he not sent for Bosler to come here and meet him? Was it not arranged then that he and Bosler should meet here? Else why the expectation? If they were to meet here, about what were they to meet? Not about the business that was closed up, but some new business. They were to meet about this affidavit. He had summoned Bosler here about this affidavit. Let us go on:

Q. You have stated in your examination-in-chief that you prepared no part of that affidavit.

You recollect how promptly and emphatically he answered—

That is my recollection.

That is a very good answer.

Q. Are you positive about that?—A. I believe it.

Q. Is your recollection clear and distinct about that?—A. I don't think I did.

Q. What is your recollection?—A. That is my recollection: that I don't think I did.

Q. Do you say positively that you did not?—A. I don't think I did.

Q. Can you say positively that you did not?—A. I am not going to speak positively about anything that is four or five years old, or three or four years old, unless I know positively from records in my possession.

He had just spoken positively of the telegram that Rerdell sent him. He had spoken positively when the counsel, on his examination-in-chief, had examined him. You will see how he began to imagine that something was coming, and how he began to prepare himself for the squall that was manifestly approaching toward him over the waters of his cross-examination.

Q. You will not even speak positively about this affidavit?—A. I say I don't believe I prepared any part of it.

Q. But you cannot say positively that you did not?—A. I will not say positively that I did not, if I can.

Q. Can you? If you can, I don't think "won't" will do.—A. I don't think I can state positively. Mr. Bosler may have come to me for suggestions. I don't remember about that.

He had not suggested a word. He swore to it positively when examined in chief by his own counsel. But, snuffing the coming storm, he says, "Mr. Bosler may have come to me for suggestions. I don't remember about that."

Q. No matter about that. Can you say positively that you did not take from Rerdell a statement written out by him and then interpolate it all the way through?—A. I do not remember any such thing.

Q. Can you state positively that you did not do it?—A. I say I don't remember it.

"Don't remember it." Is that answer satisfactory to you, gentlemen of the jury? He does not remember whether an affidavit which has figured so largely in his private history and in the political history of the country, since its date, was a paper which he took from its author originally and interpolated it himself all the way through. He does not remember, when day by day, night by night, in gladness and in sorrow, in time of grief and in time of triumph, that affidavit has been before his eyes and on his mind. For, recollect, immediately at that time commenced this investigation, and recollect that from that day to this he has clung to that affidavit as the shipwrecked mariner clings to the last plank of his vessel amidst the terrors of a hurricane. He "don't recollect" what he did about that affidavit. Is not that asking from a jury an extent of credulity that is too large for him to hope you will give? As well tell me that a parent would forget the existence of a child, or the amputation of a limb from the child that had occurred only three years ago. This affidavit was the child of his brain.

Let us see a little further :

Q. Can you say positively that you did not do it?—A. I do not remember it.

Q. Are you willing to say positively whether you did or did not?—A. I do not remember it.

Q. I ask you are you willing to say positively whether you did or not; not whether you remember it or not?—A. I simply say I do not remember it.

Q. I ask about your willingness.—A. Oh, my willingness?

Q. Are you willing to say so?—A. I will govern my willingness myself. I say I don't recollect the fact.

Mr. MERRICK. I think I have a right to the answer to that question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think the witness has answered it absolutely, directly, forty times. He says, "I do not remember."

Now, the "forty times" left out the positive times that he had answered Mr. Ingersoll, his own counsel. He had answered positively, distinctly, unequivocally, emphatically, plainly, manifestly, judicially, unjudicially, socially, privately, publicly, "I don't remember." [Laughter.]

The COURT. I understand him to speak in that sense : that he does not remember.

Mr. MERRICK. No ; but he is not willing to say.

The WITNESS. That is your assumption.

Mr. MERRICK. If that is my assumption, then I ask the court to direct that I have an answer to the question.

The COURT. No. When you have the witness's answer that he cannot remember you will have to stop.

Q. Can you tell how that affidavit came to be directed to the President of the United States?—A. [After a pause.] That may have been done—

Q. [Interposing.] I do not ask what may have been done, but I ask your recollection. Do you recollect how that affidavit came to be directed in its beginning, "Mr. President?"

Then he saw that the storm was near upon him.

A. WELL, I WANT TO CONFER WITH COUNSEL A MOMENT ABOUT THAT.

Frightened, seeing the peril he was in, he wanted to confer with his counsel before answering my question. Pitiable man! But do not let us forget, gentlemen, what he has been—great, grand, above all ordinary pygmies that obey the law, a man that now defies the law. A more pitiable spectacle was never exhibited on the witness-stand than by that creature when he asked to consult his counsel in his agonizing efforts to evade the truth.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; you cannot confer with counsel.

The COURT. No; you cannot confer with counsel, but must answer according to your best recollection when a question is put to you.

Now, let us see how it works when we force an answer.

The WITNESS. All right, your honor.

Q. What is your recollection?—A. My recollection is that after the affidavit was made and sworn to I sent for Colonel Ingersoll and submitted it to him.

After it was made and sworn to he sent for Colonel Ingersoll, and submitted it to him. What, in the name of common sense, had S. W. Dorsey to do with that affidavit? Nothing. He says nothing. Why did he want to submit it to Colonel Ingersoll? We will see presently. He wanted a nurse for it to bring it up in the way it should go, and, as I will show you presently, they led it in the way he intended it should go.

Mr. MERRICK. I object to what passed between you and Colonel Ingersoll.

The WITNESS. You have asked me a question and I want to answer it.

The COURT. He can state that fact and not say what passed between him and Colonel Ingersoll, but in pursuance of or in consequence of it.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir; of course.

A. [Continuing.] In consequence of that the affidavit was addressed to the President of the United States.

There you have him. He swore in chief that he had not participated in writing or suggesting a single word in the affidavit. But after it was made and sworn to he sent for Colonel Ingersoll, and in consequence of his sending for Colonel Ingersoll the affidavit was addressed to the President of the United States. The consultation between him and his counsel, therefore, you will infer, resulted in a change of address and in the insertion of the words "Mr. President." Now let us go a little further:

Q. It was not then addressed to the President when it was given to you?—A. Originally, I think not.

Q. Who wrote the words "Mr. President?"—A. I think Rerdell did.

Q. Had it been sworn to?—A. I am not sure whether it had or not.

He had just before said that it had not.

Q. Are you sure that you did not write the words "Mr. President?"—A. Oh, I do not know. I don't remember about that.

Q. You do not remember about that?—A. No.

Q. Were those words inserted after you sent for Colonel Ingersoll?—A. I think so.

Q. I will read you those words and the following lines:

"Mr. President: I think it is my duty to you, the Administration, and common fairness that I should make to you the following statement under oath."

When were those words written?—A. I cannot tell you.

Q. Were they written after you sent for Colonel Ingersoll or before?—A. I do not remember that.

Why, is it not perfectly palpable, gentlemen, that the address, "Mr. President," was written coincidently with the words beginning the affidavit, which are as follows:

I think it is my duty to you, the Administration, and common fairness, &c.

Is it not perfectly palpable that the words "Mr. President" were written coincidently with the first words of the affidavit, and not until after it had been determined to direct it to the President? But he does not remember that.

Q. Have you no recollection about it?—A. No, sir; none at all.

Q. Were they not written at your direction?—A. I say I don't remember whether they were or not.

He does not remember whether they were or not. This is an all-important paper to him.

Q. Was the affidavit rewritten after the insertion of the words "Mr. President?"—A. It probably was, though I do not remember. If I had written the affidavit it would not have had that sort of thing.

Q. Why not?—A. Well, there would have been a little English in it.

Q. Is the English of it bad?—A. I don't remember.

Q. Then why do you say if you had written it there would have been a little English in it? The closing of the affidavit is as follows:

"I therefore in my heart and conscience justify myself in the course I have taken in this matter, by deeming it right and proper that I should by every means in my power show to you and to the world the degradation and shame brought upon your administration by the action of two members of your Cabinet by attempting to seduce, bribe, and corrupt the confidential agent and clerk of Mr. Dorsey so as to compass his ruin and disgrace."

Were those words written after you saw Colonel Ingersoll?—A. I think not, sir.

Q. Were they not written after the beginning of the affidavit with the words "Mr. President?"

The WITNESS. There is something that precedes that, is there not?

Mr. MERRICK. There is a good deal that precedes it. I have read you the last clause of the affidavit?

A. Then it must have been written after the beginning, if it was not written at the beginning.

Q. Was it not written after the affidavit had been handed over to you as complete by Mr. Rerdell?—A. I don't think it was.

Q. Were those words in Rerdell's original draft of that affidavit, according to your statement of what that draft was?—A. I cannot tell you.

Q. Were they not written in the affidavit after the words "Mr. President" were put at the head of the affidavit?—A. I cannot tell you that.

Q. Have you any recollection about it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was the original affidavit, as you have described it as written by Mr. Rerdell, intended for the President or for the public?—A. I do not remember that.

He does not remember whether it was intended for the President or for the public! Gentlemen, I will show you presently that it was gotten up for the President of the United States and not for the public, and gotten up in self-defense.

Q. Do you not remember that you directed that the affidavit should be addressed to the President of the United States?

Now, see, it is getting a little closer.

A. That is possible. I thought he was the proper man to read it.

Did he not intend it for the President? "I thought he was the proper man to read it. It is possible that I directed that it should be addressed to the President, although I admit that I have solemnly sworn before this jury that I never suggested a word in it!!!

Q. Then that part of the affidavit which is addressed to the President of the United States was written under your direction?—A. I presume that before the affidavit was sworn to—

You recollect he says he did not know when it was sworn to—and when the original draft was made, I may have suggested the insertion of the name of the President of the United States, and addressing the affidavit to him. I think that is possible, but I don't remember about that.

Q. Did you not swear in your examination-in-chief that you had neither written nor suggested a single word of that affidavit?—A. That is my recollection now.

Q. What is your best recollection of your having suggested parts of that affidavit?—A. I have told you repeatedly over and over again that I have no recollection on that subject.

Q. Why did you state just now that it is possible you had recommended or advised that the address should be "Mr. President?"—A. Well, I say it may be possible. All things are possible. If that suggestion was made, in my belief it was made by Mr. Bosler.

So there were three of them had a hand in it, after the counsel was sent for.

Q. Was Mr. Bosler present at your interview with Mr. Ingersoll?—A. No, sir; he was not.

Q. Then what do you mean by saying it was inserted after your interview with Mr. Ingersoll?—A. I have not said that absolutely.

He is evidently disposed to try to tack a little.

Q. Have you not?—A. I said I thought it was; I think so yet.

Q. You have not said anything very absolutely. You said you thought it was and you think so yet?—A. Yes, sir; put the colonel on the stand and I guess he can tell you about it.

No, thank you, I did not want Colonel Ingersoll on the stand unless they put him there. I spoke of that the other day. I recognize that it is not generally proper that counsel in a case should take the stand.

Q. I would prefer to get it from you?—A. You seem to question my testimony.

Q. No; pardon me. I am not saying that I question your testimony. I am trying to refresh your bad recollection.—A. Oh, my memory is first rate.

Q. First rate?—A. FIRST RATE.

He had just proved it to be first-rate. Yes, I accept his oath. He swears that his memory is first-rate. I believe him. But it is his conscience that is bad. It is his conscience that is not first-rate, for if his memory is first-rate, his conscience is rotten. If his conscience is pure, and he swore honestly to the "I don't remember," his memory is not first-rate. On page 3988 this question is put to him:

Q. Was it not arranged that this affidavit should be so prepared as to present to the President of the United States serious charges and accusations against MacVeagh and James?

Now, you will see directly the reason why it was to go to the President.

A. The affidavit, if it had come from a worthy source, did present charges of that kind.

Q. I do not understand that answer.—A. I say the affidavit itself, on its face, had it come from a worthy source, presents accusations of that kind.

Q. You considered that it did not come from a worthy source?—A. Undoubtedly I did.

He considered that affidavit as coming from an unworthy source.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not understand it in that way.

Mr. MERRICK. Don't you? Let me read it again.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What page were you reading from?

Mr. MERRICK. Page 3988, about the middle of the page.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Thank you.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

Q. Was it not arranged that this affidavit should be so prepared as to present to the president of the United States serious charges and accusations against MacVeagh and James?—A. The affidavit, if it had come from a worthy source, did present charges of that kind.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, if you will read the next question to that.

Mr. MERRICK. I will read it right on.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Go on.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

Q. I do not understand that answer.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is right.

Mr. MERRICK. Here is the answer:

I say the affidavit itself, on its face, had it come from a worthy source, presents accusations of that kind.

Q. You considered that it did not come from a worthy source?—A. Undoubtedly I did.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is not right. Just read it again.

Mr. MERRICK. Pardon me; haven't I read it correctly?

Mr. INGERSOLL. What you have read you have read correctly.

Mr. MERRICK. I am going to read more.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Read the next line, which will show that he believed the affidavit at that time.

Mr. MERRICK. Ah! I understand it. I am coming to that, for he did not believe it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We will see.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; we will see.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Read the next question.

Mr. MERRICK. I will read what I like. I will read it all and deal fairly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If you don't read it I will.

Mr. MERRICK. Very well, the court can interpose and see whether I deal fairly or not. The next question is:

Q. Did you give it credit?—A. I gave it credit from the collateral evidence I had.

What collateral evidence? What collateral evidence did he have of the interview of Rerdell with James and MacVeagh?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Read the next question.

Mr. MERRICK. I will conduct this argument, may it please your honor, in my own way. I cannot and I will not stand these interruptions.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He directed his question to me.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir. I was speaking generally. I am not talking to you. I have not addressed a single question to you.

The COURT. He insists upon being allowed his undoubted privilege of making his argument in his own way.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not wish to interfere.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not think the gentleman has finished his smoke yet, or his nerves would be in better condition. He can't stand anything this afternoon.

The COURT. [To Mr. Ingersoll.] Please not to interrupt him now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will not, of course, unless it is proper for me to do so.

Mr. MERRICK. When it is proper I shall not object; but in the course of my argument to the jury it never will be proper, for, as I said in the beginning, I propose to deal more than fairly with these defendants, and upon the honor of a professional gentleman, as I would in any private transaction where the restraints of honor are obligatory.

I gave it credit—

Says he—

from the collateral evidence I had.

Where could he have had collateral evidence of the interview that Rerdell had with James and MacVeagh? What collateral evidence could he have had that MacVeagh had advised him (Rerdell) to steal Dorsey's books? What collateral evidence could he have had that MacVeagh had advised him to commit larceny and burglary?

* Now, let us see what further he says:

Q. How did you know what had passed between him and James and MacVeagh?—

A. Well, I had heard from many sources.

What sources? Woodward was present. Did Dorsey hear it from Woodward? Rerdell was present. Had he heard from Rerdell of the interview? MacVeagh was present and James was present. Had Dorsey received his information from James and MacVeagh? Gentlemen of the jury, the very reading of that lie stamps the testimony of that man as that of a perjurer. He had not learned what had passed. It was not possible that he could learn it. Standing in a criminal attitude towards the Government, and the law officers of the Department of Justice seeking to bring out the facts in regard to his crime and endeavoring to obtain the proof, would they tell what had passed at an interview between them and his man, his pupil, his clerk? No, sir. It is utterly beyond the limits of belief.

A. Well, I had heard from many sources.

Q. You had heard?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The affidavit accuses James and MacVeagh of having stimulated him, as he says here, to both burglary and larceny in stealing your books.—A. That is the right name for it.

Do you believe that he had heard from anybody at that time that MacVeagh and James had advised Rerdell to commit burglary and larceny? And if he had not heard that MacVeagh and James had advised Rerdell to commit larceny, then, when he says he had heard it from other sources, he tells what is false, does he not?

But we will go a little further, and I will come to the culminating point directly.

Q. Did you not present the affidavit as a truthful representation of the misconduct of his—ministers, and ask him to remove them on account of that misconduct?—A. I presented the affidavit, and General Garfield, in the presence of Governor Foster of Ohio and Colonel Ingersoll, stated that James and MacVeagh had made almost the exact statement contained in that affidavit to him.

The President's—

Is not that a falsehood made out of whole cloth?

Mr. INGERSOLL. What page?

Mr. MERRICK. 3988.

And I considered it his duty, and he ought to have removed them right then and there.

Do you suppose that Mr. James and Mr. MacVeagh ever told the President of the United States that they had advised one of Dorsey's accomplices to commit burglary and larceny? Do you suppose that Mr. MacVeagh, even if his proud and lofty nature could have allowed such a thought to come within the possible range of his speculative inquiries, could have told the President of the United States that he, in endeavoring to get evidence against Dorsey, had advised Dorsey's accomplice to steal his books, and to commit burglary to steal them? That proud man, pre-eminent as a lawyer, distinguished as a statesman, highly cultivated as a scholar, whose position in the department of Justice honored the Government that had honored him by placing him there—that man do these things! And then tell with pride, as if he did not understand the force of the crime with which he was charging himself, that he had advised the burglary and larceny! Gentlemen, this presses too hard upon belief.

Q. Did you not present this affidavit to him and demand their removal upon the face of that affidavit?—A. I never *demand*ed the removal of a Cabinet officer.

Q. Did you not present it to him and say to him that those men had behaved as this affidavit set forth, and they ought to be removed?—A. WELL, IF I DID NOT SAY SO, MY TONGUE DID NOT KNOW ITS CUNNING.

Now you have this solution. Here was a man, a great criminal, who claimed, as Mr. Ingersoll has intimated in his speech, exemption from penalty by reason of his political services, for he says these men disgraced the places to which Dorsey helped them, by attacking him. This man that Mr. Ingersoll says was so grand that he could defy the law, because he had helped to elevate the representatives of a political party to power—this man, afraid of the tribunals of justice and not daring to stand before the law as ordinary men are required to stand before it, procures from his menial tool, Rerdell, the individual he had so debauched and corrupted, this affidavit, charging a high crime and misdemeanor upon two Cabinet officers, and then goes to the President to get those Cabinet officers removed, in order that he who had helped to make that President, according to Mr. Ingersoll's statement, might recommend for appointment two other Cabinet officers who would be subordinate to his demands and his requirements, and stand, in their executive capacity, between him and the tribunals of justice, and save him from the penitentiary. That was his object. The testimony shows that linked arm in arm, or side by side, Mr. Rerdell and Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. S. W. Dorsey, carrying this affidavit in triumph, walked up to the White House.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is no evidence of that; no evidence that Mr. Rerdell went there.

Mr. MERRICK. Rerdell says so, and I do not think it is denied.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me say that, as a matter of fact, we did not.

Mr. MERRICK. Take the stand and swear to it, as Mr. Dorsey's counsel, and let me cross-examine you on that affidavit. I wish to get it all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well; I will do so if you desire it.

The COURT. Rerdell has testified to the fact.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly; he was left down-stairs. Let me say that if there were facts within the knowledge of counsel which would be beneficial to the defendants, according to the rule of the profession I hold that it was his duty to retire from the case as counsel, and take the stand as a witness. But he cannot testify in this manner.

The COURT. We will not discuss it further.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I could have contradicted Rerdell, but I did not think that necessary.

Mr. MERRICK. Counsel cannot testify now. The proof is that Rerdell went up there. They went up and presented that affidavit to the President, Dorsey himself saying that it had not come from a worthy source, saying himself that it had come from a man that could not be believed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have to call your attention to the evidence, that he undoubtedly at that time believed it came from a worthy source.

Mr. MERRICK. I have read that and commented upon it, haven't I, your honor?

The COURT. It is a fact which I think he has a right to call your attention to.

Mr. MERRICK. Dorsey says he believed it because he got this information from other sources, but I have shown your honor that there were no sources from which he could have got it. I have shown that he lied when he said he got it from other sources.

The COURT. You have my point.

Mr. MERRICK. You have my answer.

The COURT. You did not prove what he said.

Mr. MERRICK. I have proved it by the laws of ordinary intercourse known among men. I ask you, sir, do you believe that anybody could have procured information of what passed between MacVeagh and Rerdell, not in close confidence with MacVeagh at the time? Could anybody have done it? When Dorsey says he had information of that private conversation, do you not believe that Dorsey lied? Here is your point fairly put. Dorsey says that if it had come from a worthy source, certain inferences would follow, but it did not come from a worthy source, according to him. It came from a tainted source, from a source that he himself had tainted with his foul teachings. I believe that he knew better than any other man whether it was a worthy source or not.

That affidavit contains a statement about the removal of these two officers. And, gentlemen of the jury, that is not the only attack that has been made upon this department. Dorsey's effort, from the beginning to the end, has been to get rid of the great and distinguished men that have held these two respective offices since MacVeagh and James went out, in order that some instruments of baser purpose might stand between him and peril.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I must correct the gentlemrn once more. He says he demanded their removal. Dorsey says, on page 3988:

I never demanded the removal of a Cabinet officer.

Mr. MERRICK. And he also said, "But if I did not do all I could, my tongue had lost its cunning."

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, faugh!

Mr. MERRICK. "Oh, faugh, faugh!" But this is not very creditable in a court of justice.

The COURT. Mr. Ingersoll, take your seat, if you please.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have taken my seat.

The COURT. This is carrying the interruption a little too far.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, let me ask the court, when Mr. Merrick said that Dorsey demanded the removal of two Cabinet officers, whether I have not the right to call his attention to what Dorsey did swear.

Mr. MERRICK. I have just read it myself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. "I never demanded the removal of a Cabinet officer."

The COURT. But he said also that if he had not done it his tongue had forgotten its cunning, or something to that effect.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But he had not demanded it.

The COURT. That is trifling.

Mr. MERRICK. That is trifling.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the evidence is trifling. If we are not trying the case according to the evidence, it is trifling.

The COURT. It appears to me that it is trifling to make that the basis of an interruption of counsel.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is owing to whether he is right or not.

The COURT. He says, "I did not demand the removal of a Cabinet officer," but the next moment he says, "If I did not do all I could to have him removed then my tongue had lost its cunning;" and you make a point between demanding his removal and his effort to have him removed, with all his power and influence. I cannot see that there is much ground to stand upon for interruption in that respect.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think there is enough.

Mr. MERRICK. Gentlemen, that interruption, which has thus received the condemnation of the court, is like a great many others from which I have suffered in the course of this argument, but which I can readily pardon, as the outspoken exclamations consequent upon pain, rather than the results of judgment from looking over the testimony.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I can assure you——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Now, gentlemen of the jury, I say that not only MacVeagh and James have been the recipients of attentions from these gentlemen, but that Brady's testimony as to his papers shows that that same effort has been made on other executive officers, honorable and high men, the first in the land, one of whom [the Attorney-General] now honors this court-room with his presence, having been attacked and sought to be removed by the same identical——

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that.

The COURT. What evidence is there of that?

Mr. MERRICK. What did Brady testify about the papers?

The COURT. If there is any evidence to sustain that assertion Mr. Merrick will be sustained, and if not, I will have to stop it.

Mr. MERRICK. I cannot now recall it. I thought it was in Brady's testimony about buying his papers. It is certainly on the records, may it please your honor, in the cards of S. W. Dorsey, which form part of the case, although they may not have been read to the jury. It was in the card of S. W. Dorsey of December, or the last of November, about which I interrogated Dorsey when he was on the stand. Your honor will remember that card.

The COURT. If that card is in evidence and contains the foundation for your declarations on that subject, I shall not have you interrupted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. My recollection is that that card was referred to, and that Mr. Merrick asked Mr. Dorsey about the first paragraph, and, simply to identify it, read the first paragraph, and asked him if he remembered it. I think Dorsey said he did, but I think it was never read to the jury and never referred to again.

Mr. MERRICK. I thought the card was in evidence. I will look to-night and see whether it is.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me call your attention to another point——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] If it is not in evidence I will take it all back.

The COURT. Make no further comment now.

Mr. MERRICK. I make no further comment now, but I will look and see. There I stop. I will not comment another word upon it.

Now, to go on a little further:

Q. Did you not present it to him and say to him that those men had behaved as this affidavit set forth, and that they ought to be removed?—A. WELL, IF I DID NOT SAY SO, MY TONGUE DID NOT KNOW ITS CUNNING.

Q. That is what you used it for, is it not?—A. I used it to prevent what I believed to be a most vicious, unlawful, and improper act on the part of two executive officers of this Government.

What act did he mean, gentlemen of the jury? He does not mean an act already committed. He does not mean an act from which Rerdell had already retreated; but some other act he means. What was the "vicious, unlawful, the improper act" that he meant? The indictment and the prosecution of S. W. Dorsey under the auspices and direction of the Department of Justice. That is the only act he could have meant.

Q. That was what you wanted it for, was it not?—A. That was one of the things.

Yes, he wanted it addressed to the President that he might ask him to remove James and MacVeagh, and thus to save himself from prosecution. That was one of the things he wanted, that being one of the things he was after; and when he procured the affidavit he went with it and with his counsel and Rerdell, and although the man was rotten as a carcass that had lain out in an August sun for a week, according to the testimony of Dorsey in regard to him, he stuck the affidavit right before the President, and says here on the stand, "If I did not do everything I could to have MacVeagh and James removed on that affidavit of this one man my tongue had lost its cunning." And yet he had nothing to do with getting up that affidavit; not a thing!

Further on in the testimony, on page 3989, I asked what arrangement he had made about this matter.

Arrangement by whom?

Mr. MERRICK. I did not say by whom, but you being a party to the arrangement.

A. If there was anything that I could do that I did not do to get MacVeagh out of office, I have forgotten it. If any man ever disgraced a party that he pretended to represent, it was Wayne MacVeagh. That is my dicta, as I believe you lawyers call it.

Of course he wanted MacVeagh out of that office. An honorable man, an honest man, a sound lawyer at the head of the Department of Justice, loving his country and respecting the authority of the law and determined to do the duty of his office, was ruin to S. W. Dorsey, and therefore MacVeagh must be got rid of. It was conscious guilt wanting to be protected from arraignment at the bar of justice, where he knew any honest jury must find him guilty if the evidence was brought forward.

Then further on :

Was not that the purpose—

To turn MacVeagh out—

you had in view when you got the affidavit?—A. I stated some time ago that that was one of the purposes that I intended to use the affidavit for.

There he stepped into the trap squarely.

Q. Was not that the purpose you had in view when you got the affidavit?—A. I stated some time ago that that was one of the purposes that I intended to use the affidavit for.

Q. Did you communicate that purpose to Rerdell?—A. No, sir; I was not communicating with Rerdell at that time.

Not communicating with Rerdell at that time! Not when he wrote the words “Mr. President!” Not when he suggested “Mr. President!” Not communicating with Rerdell! Why, Rerdell was in his employment, gentlemen of the jury, and, notwithstanding his denunciation of Rerdell, Rerdell remained in his employment down to the 1st day of last August.

Now, gentlemen, in connection with the address of that affidavit and the last part of it, and all those parts of it that look to the removal of James and MacVeagh, let me ask you, in confirmation of the proof I have already furnished that Dorsey wrote it or ordered it to be written why should Rerdell at his own suggestion have addressed it to the President? Why should Rerdell have sought to have James and MacVeagh removed? Rerdell, the subordinate, Rerdell who, had no interest, why should he have conceived the plan of addressing that paper to the President? It must be plain to you that the affidavit was intended to subserve the purpose Dorsey had in view from the beginning, namely, not so much the protection of himself from what he says was a false statement made by Rerdell as to have MacVeagh and James removed. This is plain to you from the language of the affidavit and the terms in which the charges are couched against James and MacVeagh. When those circumstances are connected with the fact that Dorsey and his counsel went up with that affidavit to the President, taking Rerdell with them, and laid it before the President—that Dorsey’s tongue used all the cunning it had not forgotten to have James and MacVeagh removed—and that Dorsey prepared that affidavit precisely as Rerdell testified, I think I may justly take from off Rerdell the black robes given him by the counsel and put them on the shoulders of Stephen W. Dorsey.

If we are to have burials of men in this case, gentlemen of the jury, after what I have shown you about S. W. Dorsey, let us bury him for his perjury. Open for him a grave by the side of Rerdell. Put him in. Call for the chief mourners, his co-conspirators in this case. Stand back, and let them gather around this last resting-place of their chief genius and leading power. Lower him gently into the tomb. Mourners, give way. Room—room for the orator of the occasion—a funeral oration, a choice specimen carefully selected from the stock on hand. And now let us give him a monument, as Mr. Ingersoll proposed to give to Rerdell. What shall it be? Let it be an arch, with one abutment resting at the head of Rerdell's grave and the other resting at the head of Dorsey's, and on the key-stone let there be written this epitaph:

"They were amiable and lovely in their lives, and in death they were not parted."

And if, notwithstanding the counsel's prayer, Gabriel, when he comes over those graves, should blow his trump, and the corrupt and buried Dorsey should arise, an immortal spirit, and come into that last grand court, before the Searcher of hearts, where we must all appear, and the question should be then asked upon his arraignment there, "Were you not O, spirit, when in the flesh known and called by the name of Stephen W. Dorsey," the spirit would answer, "I don't remember." [Laughter.]

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

FRIDAY, JUNE 8, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

The FOREMAN. If the court please, at the suggestion of several members of the jury, I request that we may be allowed to again see the pencil memorandum, the Clendenning letter, the letter of Dorsey to Paddock, and also one of Rerdell's letters containing his signature.

The COURT. That is a proper request.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

[The papers asked for were submitted to the jury.]

Mr. DAVIDGE. I would like to have the account of John W. Dorsey with Rerdell, also, to submit to the jury.

The COURT. Several specimens of Rerdell's writing may be submitted.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, yes. The jury may have any papers they ask for. If they ask for that account they can, of course, have it. [Account submitted to jury.] I will also submit, gentlemen, in the course of my argument, 9 O, 40 F, and 30 S, to which I called your attention yesterday.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the court please, I do not think that 30 S, at all events, ought to be submitted to the jury in this connection. It is not a letter admitted to be written by Dorsey. It is a letter that purports to be written by John W. Dorsey. Boone says he thinks it was written by S. W. Dorsey, and I think Rerdell says so; but Boone says it is in a handwriting very much unlike Senator Dorsey's. I do not think it ought to be submitted for comparison.

The COURT. No paper ought to be submitted to the jury as the writing of a party unless it is admittedly his.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is what I say.

The COURT. No paper, the authenticity of which is in dispute, ought to be submitted.

Mr. CARPENTER. 30 S is in dispute.

Mr. MERRICK. Boone said it was in the disguised hand of Dorsey, and Dorsey did not deny the authorship of the letter.

Mr. CARPENTER. Dorsey could not see.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It is a disputed letter.

Mr. CARPENTER. Proved to be in a disguised hand. It therefore cannot be a good letter to make a comparison with.

The COURT. No.

Mr. MERRICK. He says he disguised his handwriting sometimes.

Mr. CARPENTER. Who says so?

Mr. MERRICK. Boone says so.

Mr. CARPENTER. I think not.

Mr. MERRICK. I think so.

Mr. CARPENTER. He did not say it. You are mistaken.

Mr. MERRICK. Boone swore that Dorsey disguised his hand and that he wrote that letter.

Mr. CARPENTER. He did not swear to that. He said it was a disguised hand. He did not say it was Dorsey's disguised hand.

Mr. MERRICK. He said it was Dorsey's disguised hand.

The COURT. That is a question.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Merrick showed the jury that very paper yesterday and I objected then.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court and gentlemen of the jury, I am glad you have again had an opportunity to make these comparisons. Before I make any comment on them allow me to call your attention to the testimony of Boone in reference to the question that arose as to 30 S, and as to Dorsey's simulating another's handwriting. I read from page 2702:

Q. I hand you 30 S.—A. This is in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey.

So says Boone, and Dorsey does not deny it. On page 2693 is the testimony to which I referred in reference to the disguised hand. That testimony does not relate to 30 S. It relates to 19 F.

I will hand both the papers to the jury and let them look at them. In reference to 19 F, the testimony is as follows:

Q. In whose handwriting is it?—A. It is a handwriting entirely different from Stephen W. Dorsey's.

The COURT. That is not an answer to the question. Who wrote that letter, if you know, judging from the handwriting?

The WITNESS. It resembles the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey; it is a disguised handwriting. It is different from the ordinary way he writes.

Whilst you are looking at those papers I may still continue; for, gentlemen, I am resolved to conclude this already too much protracted argument to-day, even if I have to omit a great many things that I would like to say to you. I want you to bear in mind that there is a great deal of difficulty in determining handwriting by comparison under any circumstances, but the comparison of the hands in question here can be readily made. There can be no doubt, when you compare the handwriting of Dorsey in the communications admitted to be his with the pencil memorandum, that the pencil memorandum was written by Dorsey. If Rerdell had, as Colonel Ingersoll thinks, attempted to forge this memorandum since the last trial for the purpose of being used as evidence, and was the expert that they claim him to be in the use of the pen, certainly he would not have been fool enough to write like himself. If there is a resemblance between the handwriting in the memorandum and his own handwriting, it is the best evidence in the world, under the circumstances of this case, that the memorandum is genuine. I can see in the handwriting of Dorsey a slight resemblance to the handwriting of Rerdell, and Rerdell may have in that particular imitated the writing of his master as he imitated him in other respects.

The FOREMAN. There seems to have been a press copy made of one of these letters from its appearance.

Mr. BLISS. That is true of many of the oaths. I do not know what particular paper you refer to.

Mr. MERRICK. If Rerdell were going to forge a paper, he would make it as little like his own writing as possible. The forgery would not be accidental; it would be deliberate. Being deliberate, he would take it away as far as possible from any semblance or similitude to his own hand. But the conclusive proof in reference to that memorandum is this, as I stated to you yesterday, that it is reflected on the books. Did the red books exist? Did Donnelly tell the truth? Did Gibbs tell the truth? Did those red books exist between Christmas, 1879, and March, 1880, as in the first place Donnelly swears and in the second place Gibbs swears? If so, then, as I said before, they contained the shadow of this memorandum, and the shadow could not be on the books without the existence of the substance to cast that shadow. This is proof infinitely better than all evidence of handwriting. I will now show you 5 E, which Mr. Bliss hands me as being in Dorsey's handwriting.

Mr. BLISS. The testimony on the subject is on page 2691.

Q. I now show you 5 E, and ask in whose handwriting it is?

Mr. INGERSOLL. What is it?

Mr. BLISS. It is a letter transmitting an oath.

A. It has the appearance of being in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey.

Q. Is that your best judgment?—A. Yes, sir.

The COURT. Let me see it. I would know it myself now.

Q. Who does the signature purport to be by?—A. John W. Dorsey. It is the same writing all the way through.

Mr. MERRICK. I show this paper to the jury for the purpose of letting them see that S. W. Dorsey simulated John W. Dorsey's handwriting; that he simulated and forged John W. Dorsey's handwriting. I do not care about any comparison of that with any other paper. I show it to prove an independent fact.

Mr. CARPENTER. We do not admit that to be in S. W. Dorsey's handwriting. Counsel for the prosecution do not profess that we do. They have not stated that we do. They say it was proved by somebody.

Mr. MERRICK. I show you as an independent fact that S. W. Dorsey, as you will see by this paper, simulated or forged John W. Dorsey's handwriting.

Mr. HENKLE. Who is the witness from whose testimony you read?

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Boone.

Mr. MERRICK. Gentlemen, I want you to pass that paper around and look at it, and I will pause in the mean time, for I think you had better examine it carefully.

[Mr. Merrick here paused to enable the jury to examine the paper last referred to.]

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). John W. Dorsey's signature on 19 F is entirely different from that on the paper you first handed to us, 5 E.

Mr. BLISS. 5 E transmitted the oath.

Mr. MERRICK. It transmits the oath. Boone testifies that Dorsey wrote both. They are different, but when a man undertakes to forge a signature he writes in a different hand.

Mr. BLISS. "The letter of John W. Dorsey, signature and all, is written in a disguised hand, which resembles that of S. W. Dorsey." That is the testimony.

Mr. MERRICK. That is 19 F ?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. [To the jury.] The best evidence is that of comparison ; look at the "y," which is the same in both. The same man wrote both of them. 5 E transmitted the oath which was filed when Rerdell was not here ; he was out West.

Mr. BLISS. That paper is dated the 28th of April ; that, with the oath, was filed on the 30th of April, 1879.

Mr. CRANE. I see no file mark on this 5 E showing when it was filed.

Mr. BLISS. It transmits the oath, and the oath was filed on that day. [Oath shown to Mr. Crane.]

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] Gentlemen, I stated in a preceding part of my argument that, with the affidavit of June 1881 under their arms, S. W. Dorsey, Mr. Ingersoll, and Mr. Rerdell went to the President. Some little irregularity took place in the colloquy between Mr. Ingersoll, the court, and myself, in which, with a great deal of irregularity, Mr. Ingersoll volunteered the statement that Rerdell did not go to the President at that time in their company. I have no doubt that is so. But Rerdell did go up with them to the Executive Mansion, and they left him in the ante-room while they went in to see the President. In my mind's eye I can see the three worthies now, arm-in-arm, with that affidavit in charge, going up the avenue to the White House to get the President of the United States to discharge two of his Cabinet ministers, upon a paper coming from a man whose statements they then believed to be unworthy of credit. Reconcile the statement, therefore, with Rerdell's testimony, which was that he went up to the President's house and remained in an ante-room ready to be sent for if necessary to help this conspiracy to turn out MacVeagh, and thus prevent the prosecution of Dorsey.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, I call your attention for a little while—and I shall be as brief as possible—to what the other side seems to consider an important transaction in the course of these proceedings, namely, the distribution of the routes on the 1st day of April, 1879. I need not remind you that I have traced this conspiracy, step by step, down to that period of time and beyond it, and as I have gone along, showing how Stephen W. Dorsey asked Miner to come in with his brother and Peck, because, as Stephen W. Dorsey said at the time, he thought it would be a good thing for Miner ; and how Stephen W. Dorsey came on to Washington and got Boone to assist in the transaction, and throughout was the guiding genius and spirit of its conduct, its speculations, and its adventures ; and how John W. Dorsey contributed his aid with ready affidavits whenever required ; how Miner said that they were "all good affidavit men," and understood the whole scheme and speculation ; how Vaile came in without security, in the fullness of his philanthropic heart, giving aid to the scheme the money that had been accumulated by the sweat of his brow, without the slightest security of any kind to insure its repayment ; how these routes, at the time largely losing, were subsequently changed by the alchemy of fraud and perjury into routes giving immense gains ; and how Brady piled up those tremendous orders, unprecedented in the history of the records of the department, to such an extent that even his honor, when he came to speak of the admissibility of our testimony, said in substance that he stood amazed before them. I need not remind you of all this, but taking it as a conceded fact, for the purpose of my argument, that a conspiracy to defraud the Government in reference to these routes existed on the 1st day of April, 1879 ; that those routes had then been expedited by these criminal, illegal, and outrageous processes; taking it for granted that the conspiracy then existed, the question which I now desire to direct your attention to is whether by the transaction of that day, the 1st of April, 1879, there was any termination or abandonment by the parties of that conspiracy. For you must find, in order to find a verdict of guilty, that the conspiracy, as such, existed between these parties subsequent to the 23d day of May, 1879, the time when it is laid in the indictment that the conspiracy existed. Not that it was formed then. But no matter when formed or where formed, was it in existence on the 23d day of May, 1879, or since that date? I mean the conspiracy existing prior to and on the 1st day of April, 1879.

I lay it down as a proposition of law, which I presume the court will tell you is correct, that if you find these orders on these routes, and the proceedings thereon, tainted with criminality on the 1st of April, 1879, before this division took place; if you find that up to that time these conspirators were seeking by perjury and other unlawful means to rob the treasury of the people, no division at that time of the plunder acquired up to that day could free them from the crime they had committed, or terminate the conspiracy in which they had been engaged; but that, as these contracts had three years to run from April, 1879, and were continuing contracts, the distribution of the contracts was a division of plunder the profits on which were to be realized in the future, and that such a transaction was not a parting with the crime of conspiracy. But claiming the property then divided as plunder and resting that claim upon a manifest and unequivocal testimony, I say that if, when these contracts were distributed, to wit, on the 1st of April, 1879, you find that they were tainted, and that in the division it was agreed and understood that the distributees should respectively do for one another whatever was necessary "to carry out the business," then the conspiracy continued under the operations of that covenant, and the distribution was made not to get rid of the crime of conspiracy, or to break up the conspiracy, but to leave to the respective parties a more facile mode of carrying out the design to rob the Government, each party freed from the caprices of the others, and each having the right to call upon the others for such aid as might be needed feloniously and burglariously to enter the national Treasury. I think you all comprehend that proposition without my dwelling upon it any longer than simply to repeat it.

Now, what was the fact in reference to this subject? Let us see what the agreement was. Bear in mind, gentlemen, that the parties testify that, after the 1st of April, Miner and Vaile had no interest whatever in the routes taken by S. W. Dorsey; that S. W. Dorsey and John W. Dorsey and Peck had no interest whatever in the routes taken by Miner and Vaile, and that Peck and John W. Dorsey had no interest in anybody's routes. That is their testimony—that after the 1st of April there was no interest of a practical kind by Miner and Vaile in the routes taken by S. W. Dorsey, and no interest by S. W. Dorsey in the routes taken by Miner and Vaile. But what was the agreement of distribution? Although there was no interest of one distributee in the routes of another distributee, did the conspiracy end? Was it designed that the fraud should stop? Was it designed that the co-operative efforts of the several parties should cease at that time? John W. Dorsey on his cross-examination says—

Mr. CARPENTER. [Interposing.] What page, please?

Mr. MERRICK. 4105.

Q. At the time you sold out, was there any understanding about your making papers?—A. That was a part of the agreement. I was to sign all the necessary papers TO CARRY ON THE BUSINESS.

The business was to be carried on. “If anybody got one of my routes upon which I was contractor, I was to sign for him the necessary papers to carry on the business.” Not necessary papers of transfer—not necessary papers to consummate title, for that was done and accomplished; but the papers were “to carry on the business ;” that is, to execute the purpose of the conspiracy, which was the business of getting increase and expedition upon false affidavits. On his cross-examination, on page 4123:

Q. If you had nothing to do with these routes after the division, explain how it came that on this route, 38113, you made an affidavit on the 26th day of April, 1879, in order to get increased pay for expedition.

Now, if he had no interest after the 1st of April, how comes it that on the 26th of April he made this affidavit, the character of which I have already explained to you, gentlemen, made in blank and filled up?

A. When I sold out I agreed to sign all the necessary papers.

Q. That was part of the consideration, was it?—A. That was the agreement.

Q. You agreed to sign what?

Mr. BLISS. That question was by the court.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

By the COURT:

Q. You agreed to sign what?—A. All the necessary papers to carry on the business.

I did not observe that that question was asked by the court. It emphasizes the question. He answered that he agreed to sign all the necessary papers. The court wanted to know what necessary papers he meant, whether papers to carry out transfer of title, or papers to carry on business. “What do you mean by necessary papers?” “I mean all necessary papers to carry on the business.” Now, what else?

Q. Any papers that the parties having the routes might ask you to sign you agreed to sign?—A. All the necessary papers, AND THEY CLAIMED THAT THESE AFFIDAVITS WERE NECESSARY PAPERS.

On certain routes where John W. Dorsey was contractor, by reason of so being contractor, and having certain relations to them, he was the only man that could furnish the lever with which to pry open the Treasury door, and he stipulated, according to his own language, that he was to furnish affidavits for expedition, and I have shown you that those affidavits were the levers that pried open the door and made the robbery possible. He was then to furnish the affidavit. I have shown you that the affidavit was the foundation of this robbery. I have shown it to you from the records in the department; and then those records have had a flood of light thrown upon them by the testimony of Moore, when he says that he had a conversation with Miner at Denver, in which he told Miner that the more expedition they got upon the Oregon routes the worse it would be for them, and that Miner replied, “The expedition depends upon the affidavit, and we are all good affidavit men.”

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). Do not the regulations require that the affidavit should be made by the contractor?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir.

The COURT. The regulations require that the affidavit for expedition should be made by the contractor.

Mr. MERRICK. But Brady did not respect that order. He had taken the affidavit of the subcontractor; and there were cases where the person who made the affidavit was neither contractor nor subcontractor, as in John W. Dorsey's case. Another man could not make it according to the regulations. Nevertheless, Brady did take others fraudulently and for the benefit of these conspirators, and Brady swore on the stand that it was all right to take them. He did not care for the regulations or laws either.

I think, if the affidavits were originally written in blank, and the parties interested were authorized to fill them up with as many horses and men as they pleased, the man that swore to the affidavits was a participant in the fraud with the man who filled them up, and that is what John W. Dorsey did when he continued the business of the conspiracy.

The COURT. This affidavit is dated the 26th of April; that, of course, is outside of the date of the conspiracy.

Mr. MERRICK. I am not using it as an overt act.

The COURT. The conspiracy must be shown to have been since the 23d of May.

Mr. MERRICK. Of course. I am proving that the conspiracy which, on the 26th of April—

Mr. HENKLE. [Interposing.] This was in May.

Mr. MERRICK. What odds does it make? Don't trouble yourselves.

The COURT. The prosecution has been allowed to show, as far as able, that the conspiracy existed prior to the 23d of May, and they had a right, of course, to bring it down to that point, on the condition that they show that it was continued since the 23d of May.

Mr. MERRICK. I am arguing now to show that it did not end on the 1st of April. The other side say it did.

Mr. HENKLE. We say the division was completed on the 5th of May.

Mr. MERRICK. That is a division gotten up by the acrobatic Miner. There was nothing on God's earth done on the 5th of May, except to write a letter to the Post-Office Department asking that certain matters addressed in a certain way should be sent to a particular place. The others all swore that it was on the 1st of April.

Mr. DAVIDGE. They all say that the routes were divided on the 5th of May.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; that is not so. The subcontracts all bear date on the 1st of April, and they all swear that it was on the 1st of April; and the reason of it, may it please your honor, was that that was the end of a quarter.

The COURT. Now, Mr. Davidge wants to interrupt you.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Simply to say that in my view—for I cannot compete with my learned brother in the article of voice—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I suppose that is the reason you did not argue the case.

Mr. DAVIDGE. One reason, and another very good one is that I did not deem it necessary, after listening to the fourteen days' argument on your side; nor did the possibility of the fourteen days being supplemented by ten days more impress upon my mind any absolute necessity for me to argue it.

I was only going to say—and if I am wrong of course I will be the first to take it back—that the agreement was made some time in the month of March, which was to take effect on the 1st of April, and the routes on the 5th of May were actually divided. Not until that time were they actually partitioned off, and the department notified. But the agreement was made in March, to take effect on the 1st of April, because that was the end of the current quarter, and the partition and notification to the department were in May. And on the 1st of April, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey was not in the city of Washington.

Mr. BLISS. On page 4225 Mr. John R. Miner says that the division was previous to a certain date, and that the first meeting was on the 6th of March.

Q. When did they agree upon the terms?—A. I cannot fix the exact date, except that a note which I have, of the 29th of March, refreshes my memory that the division of the routes—that is, the setting off of the routes—was perfected previous to that date.

The 29th of March.

Q. Previous to what date?—A. The 29th of March. I have a note that fixes that date; but we could not divide the debts until the quarter had expired and towards a month afterwards, because the amount of them could not yet be ascertained. We did not know what the deductions would be and we could not ascertain the amount of the bills on the routes we were running ourselves.

At the bottom of page 4226 the witness says:

The WITNESS. You misunderstood me. The arrangement as to the division and the division of the routes took place at the same interview.

Q. Can you fix the date of that interview?—A. I fix it only as prior to March 29, 1879. I have no memorandum or recollection of the exact date. It was subsequent to the 4th of March and prior to the 29th of March, 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. On the 1st of April they divided up these routes, and the proof from themselves is, although they may equivocate and falsify to get out of a seeming trouble, that after the 1st of April one had no interest in the routes of another.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Mr. Merrick, will you allow me to direct your attention to the fact——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I prefer to go on with my argument.

The COURT. Mr. Davidge may read——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Very well.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Mr. Merrick stopped at a certain point, and I propose to read a few lines of what he omitted.

Mr. MERRICK. From what page?

Mr. DAVIDGE. From page 4227, the same page where you were reading.

Q. Were you present?—A. I was. Subsequently Mr. Dorsey went to New Mexico and——

Q. [Interposing.] I do not care about that. Then at that drawing the routes drawn by you and Vaile passed to you, did they?—A. They did.

Q. And the routes drawn by Dorsey for Peck and John passed to them?—A. They did.

Q. You had no pecuniary interest in the routes that passed to them?—A. None after that date.

Q. And they had no pecuniary interest in the routes that passed to you?—A. None.

Q. None whatever?—A. None whatever.

Q. On the 1st of April you executed papers, passing respectively to each other the titles?—A. Not on the 1st of April certainly, but some time during April I should judge.

The COURT. What matters it? The parties had come to a substantial agreement in March. Vaile says so, and Stephen W. Dorsey, too, as well as Miner. On the 6th of March that agreement was substantially concluded, although it was not formally executed.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is it exactly. I concur with your honor. It ran along——

The COURT. [Interposing.] Of course there were some other matters that could not be fixed up.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HENKLE. Until the end of the quarter.

The COURT. But between the parties there was a verbal agreement, as I understand it, concluded about the 6th of March. Vaile, and Stephen W. Dorsey were the substantial parties to that contract.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

The COURT. The rest all followed them. Miner followed Vaile, and Stephen W. Dorsey took his party.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Your honor must see that Miner did not follow Vaile at all, because Miner got 30 per cent. under the division, and afterwards Vaile and Miner went into copartnership, Vaile getting 40 per cent.

The COURT. That was between Vaile and Miner.

Mr. CARPENTER. I think Mr. Turner states in his testimony that he himself received notification of the division at the department on the 5th of May.

Mr. MERRICK. What was that? It was not notice of the division; it was notice to send papers to a certain place.

The COURT. Those were all matters——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] All matters of form and immaterial, for the witnesses all swear that, after the 1st of April, Dorsey had no interest in the Vaile routes, and Vaile had none in the Dorsey routes.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is so; we do not deny that.

Mr. MERRICK. Very well. Then if the interest ceased on the 1st of April that is the substantial fact. The business to be done afterwards by the parties respectively for each other was not to transfer title, according to John W. Dorsey; it was to make affidavits to carry on the business; it was “to carry on the business,” to use his language, and the division that was made was made because of the caprice and ill-will of the parties, so that they need not be jostled and disturbed in the distribution of the proceeds of their robbery by the fraudulent increases, and they found it easier and more promotive of harmony to divide the routes and let each man take care of his own for himself on the affidavits furnished to one side and the other by the respective parties. That is all. They were doing the thing in harmony, keeping up the spirit of the conspiracy, united in the consummation of a common object, each standing ready to help the other and each helping the other. Instead of dividing up the money after it was drawn, they divided up the papers upon which it was to be drawn, and they divided up those papers in blank, may it please your honor. They were all blanks to be filled up as occasion might require, and whenever any one of those blanks was filled up, it was filled up in execution of the conspiracy, which was continued under the agreement that they would do what was necessary to carry it on. If, as your honor remarked to Mr. Bliss, in the course of his argument—I think your honor made the remark—the thing was innocent in itself on the 1st of April, then why should their acts in that connection tend to prove guilt? But if the thing was guilty on the 1st of April, then whatever grew out of that guilty thing was guilty as long as it remained in action. I understood that to be the view of the court then; I understand that to be the view of the court now. Therefore, I hold that if I have established the conspiracy as of the 1st of April, I have established it within this indictment.

Q. You sold out for so much money?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In consideration of so much money you transferred all your interest in these contracts, and further agreed to execute any necessary papers in the course of carrying out those contracts?

Any papers necessary in the course of carrying them out.

A. Yes, sir; that was the agreement as I understood it.

Q. Were the others to do the same thing?—A. I do not know anything about that. I had nothing to do with that at all.

Q. You do not know anything about it?—A. No, sir; it was not any affair of mine at all.

Q. You carried out your part of the agreement?—A. I did; I tried to as far as I could.

Q. You signed any necessary papers they brought to you?—A. Yes, sir; any that I thought was proper and right, I signed. [Page 4124.]

Therefore he signed those affidavits of the 21st and 26th of April, 1879, sent to him by Rerdell.

Here is what Miner said. You will find directly, as I go along, that he was in a little trouble, and he was just as ready to account for the trouble as to account for the Hayes letters, and did it just as wisely. I read from page 4170:

Q. What did you have to do, if anything, with regard to his routes after the separation?—A. Not a thing. I never touched pen to paper for them after the 5th of May.

Mr. WILSON. I think you are mistaken as to the page you have given.

Mr. MERRICK. I have it so marked here.

Mr. BLISS. The page may be wrong, but that is what he said, undoubtedly.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading from page 4212:]

Q. Do you say that all the orders for pay that have been introduced in evidence in this case which purport to have been signed by you on routes that went to Senator Dorsey in the division were signed by you prior to or on the 5th of May?—A. Prior to the 5th of April, 1879; probably some time in April.

* * * * *

Q. Did you authorize Mr. Dorsey to fill a blank with the date whenever the exigency arose?—A. I did.

He gives Dorsey orders for pay on the routes that had passed to Dorsey, and authorizes him to fill up blanks whenever the emergency arises.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Merrick, I wish to call your attention to the fact that you omitted something.

Mr. MERRICK. I have to omit some things. I cannot read all this testimony. I take the substance, may it please your honor.

Mr. WILSON. I will have to appeal to the court.

Mr. MERRICK. Very well; appeal to the court.

Mr. WILSON. What the counsel has just read—

A. Prior to the 5th of April, 1879; sometime in April—

Was followed by this question and answer:

Q. Why were those orders signed in blank in that way?—A. To enable them to draw the pay. If they chose to borrow money on the route, there being a subcontract on file, the party in whose favor the subcontract was could file a receipt, which would relieve the pay, and he could then put his draft in the hands of a banker and borrow money on it.

Then follows the question and answer which he last read:

Q. Did you authorize Mr. Dorsey to fill a blank with the date whenever the exigency arose?—A. I did.

Mr. MERRICK. Very good. Now, I appeal to your honor, is that interruption justifiable under any rule of law?

The COURT. I think so.

Mr. MERRICK. I will tell you why it is not?

The COURT. Go on.

Mr. MERRICK. For the reason that I say before the jury, and contend, that the only question I was developing was whether the papers were in blank and Dorsey authorized to fill them up. He says they were in blank, and Dorsey was authorized to fill them up. The question before goes into the reasons why they were in blank, namely, that Dorsey might have greater facilities in the use of the orders. What had that to do with my argument?

Again, on page 4213:

Q. Why were they intended to be in blank?—A. Because there was no telling the amount; the amount was at that time undetermined; we might want to draw an order for part of the pay or all of the pay.

Therefore the amounts and the dates were left in blank, furnishing to the party that took the route every facility that the original owner upon the route had, in order to carry out the original agreement:

Q. Is the same true of the orders which you have signed?—A. I dated those the 1st of April, 1879. You will not find any dated later than that, that is, so far as I remember from seeing them in the record.

Now S. W. Dorsey says, in his cross-examination, on page 3396:

Q. At the time of this distribution of these routes, in view of this law of Congress which I have just read and the affidavit that was required by the Post-Office Department as the basis of the pro rata calculation, did you not also divide up among you a lot of blank affidavits?—A. I do not remember about that.

Q. Do you know whether you did or not?—A. I do not know.

Q. Do you not know that it was understood between the parties that affidavits should be furnished, if necessary, respectively, by one side to the other?—A. Oh, there may have been some conversation of that sort.

I have in the previous part of the argument, gentlemen, shown you that the blank affidavits were divided up among the distributees on the 1st of April, 1879, and that Peck's affidavits, made in December and February in blank, were not filled up and filed in the department until after the 1st of April, and that they were then filled up by the respective parties holding the routes to which the affidavits belonged by reason of Peck's relation to these routes. That being the agreement upon which the division took place, the next question that arises is, what did these parties do under that agreement? Let us see. The agreement is positively proved, as I have said, by John W. Dorsey, and is substantially proved by what transpired afterwards.

Let us look at the affidavit of John R. Miner on the route from Saint Charles to Greenhorn, dated April 17, 1879, and filed April 18, 1879, upon which the contract price was raised from $548 to $3,068.80.

Mr. CARPENTER. What is the page?

Mr. MERRICK. Page 4187 of the record refers to the route, I think. You will find it all under the head of that route. That route was originally taken by Miner. It passed to Stephen W. Dorsey in the distribution. On April 17, 1879, after the division, when Miner had no further interest in the route at all, he made an affidavit for expedition, which affidavit was filed April 18, 1879. On that affidavit there was, on July 14, 1879, an order allowing $2,630.40. The affidavit was written by Miner after the division, and I have shown to you that that is one of the affidavits which was false according to the proof in the case.

Q. I want to ask you whether you had any interest in that route at the time you made the affidavit, either present or prospective?—A. I had not.

Now let us go a little further. This was all right enough possibly if the original thing had been right; but if there was a conspiracy up to April 1, then these things were done—as I have shown you—under an agreement to carry out that conspiracy, and they cannot protect themselves from the body of the crime by simply showing a division of the routes.

Route 46132, from Julian to Colton, was originally taken by John M. Peck. In the distribution it was taken by Vaile. John M. Peck made an affidavit on December 30, 1878. Bear in mind that the affidavit was made by Peck on that day on that route thus taken by Vaile. It was filed April 11, 1879. On June 24, 1879, there was granted on that affidavit an order giving an increase of pay to the amount of $5,346. The affidavit was written by Miner. It was filled in by Miner. It was interlined, as you will see, from an examination of the affidavit. Now you have one affidavit of Miner's on a route of his that passed to Dorsey, made after the 1st of April and after he ceased to have any interest in the route. You have an affidavit of Peck made in 1878 on the route from Julian to Colton, which passed to Vaile and Miner, which affidavit, though made in December, 1878, was not filed until April, 1879. That was one of the blank affidavits distributed to the party who took the route at the time of the division. That was one of the burglar's tools on hand and in stock at that time. Now I submit, gentlemen, that this interchange of services after the distribution shows, if what John W. Dorsey said in that respect is true, that the distribution of the routes was merely for the purpose of enabling the parties to carry on the business, instead of ending the conspiracy, and that the covenant was that the one should do for the other whatever was necessary to carry on the business. The business was carried on by these affidavits, and subsequently all the way down from the 11th of April and the 26th of April, when these affidavits were filed, mutual offices were done and interchanged and orders were passed which are set forth in the indictment as overt acts, and show a continuation of the conspiracy.

I will now proceed to the other point, namely, a discussion of the overt acts.

In the discussion of the overt acts you will find that the continuation of the conspiracy will necessarily come in and the fact that it was continued be fully developed. The date of the conspiracy as laid in the indictment is May 13, 1879. It is for you to find from the evidence that the conspiracy was in existence since that date. If the conspiracy existed before, and you find that the object was to defraud the Government of the United States by the means stated, of increases and expeditions through fraudulent petitions and fraudulent affidavits, you cannot fail to find that that conspiracy continued and that those means were resorted to after the 23d day of May, 1879. The whole and entire question then hinges upon the general inquiry: Was there originally a conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States?

Route 34149, from Kearney to Kent: July 10, 1879, there was an order for increase and expedition (1 A, page, 567). On that order thus made, gentlemen of the jury, within the period—and all the orders and papers of which I am going to speak to you now are within the period—no expedition was in fact obtained. The mail was carried before the order in a shorter time than it was after the order, and the order of expedition only operated to take from the Treasury $2,200, for which there was no consideration whatever.

The COURT. Do you treat that order as an overt act?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir; that order is an overt act.

The COURT. So charged in the indictment?

Mr. MERRICK. So charged in the indictment.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to have the indictment.

Mr. MERRICK. Get the indictment.

Route 35015, from Vermillion to Sioux Falls: July 10, 1879, order for increase and expedition (7 R, page 1904).

Route 35051, from Bismarck to Tongue River. August 2, 1879, order to increase three trips, which order made it six trips, doubling the fraudulent allowance in the first order on that route. As it doubled the fraudulent amounts this order itself became fraudulent, and that is an evidence of the continuation of the conspiracy and of acts done under the agreement.

Route 38134, from Pueblo to Rosita: July 8, 1879, order for increase and expedition. Oath of J. W. Dorsey, subcontractor, acted on; averred as filed on the day of that order. Although the oath had been filed before, it was treated as filed on the day it was acted on, and the man who filed it continued in the commission of the crime of filing up to the day the oath so filed was used to produce its fraudulent effect, of which he got the benefit. This oath was filled in by Rerdell.

Route 38135, from Saint Charles to Greenhorn: On June 26, 1879, there was an order for increase and expedition. On November 10, 1880, there was an order to embrace Agate. They had no right to put that on the route, as has been explained to you. On December 14, 1880, there was an order of Brady to omit Agate and allow a month's extra pay. No work was done, and no mail was carried.

Route 38145, from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City: February 26, 1881, order to increase four trips. If your honor please, this was a retroactive order, dated February 26, requiring the department to pay from January 15, 1881. Your honor will recollect that this retroactive order was made upon the telegram which had been sent out before, making an increase upon a short distance of the route; but when the order came to be made it extended over the entire route, passing by and disregarding the small portion of the route specified in the telegram. That was the Chama order, as will be remembered.

Route 38152, from Ouray to Los Pinos: August 3, 1880, order to discontinue and allow a month's extra pay when no service had been performed.

Route 38156, from Silverton to Parrott City—

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] I desire to ask, if you will allow me to make an inquiry of the court without interrupting you. I wish to inquire of the court whether it would be proper, as Mr. Merrick is now speaking of these overt acts, for me to bring to the attention of the court, and to the attention of the counsel, the indictment in that respect. If it is not, I do not want to say anything about it.

The COURT. I think you had better not interrupt him. He is assuming his own positions, and he has a right to do that.

Mr. MERRICK. I am assuming my own positions, may it please your honor, and on the proper occasion I will maintain every one of them.

The COURT. I suppose, of course, that the other side will give you the opportunity.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; we will give him the opportunity.

Mr. MERRICK. There will be plenty of opportunity.

Mr. WILSON. I did not know but what you might want the matter brought up now.

Mr. MERRICK. I am obliged to you. You are kind and generous; I know you would like to make a speech.

Route 38156, from Silverton to Parrott City: Order for increase and expedition, June 12, 1879. Oath of John W. Dorsey filled in by Rerdell on figures given by S. W. Dorsey after it was sworn to. The order was passed June 12, 1879. That is an overt act. It was a continuation of the bargain of the 1st of April, and of the conspiracy.

Route 40113, Tres Alamos to Clifton: May 23, 1879, letter of J. W.

Dorsey transmitting petition. What had J. W. Dorsey to do with that business? Petition 9 O, written by S. W. Dorsey. Petition 11 O, written by John A. Sibbald. 12 O, another petition written by James W. Donnelly. He is the same witness who testified about the books, and who worked for Dorsey. [In reply to a remark by Mr. Carpenter which was inaudible to the reporter.] He was Dorsey's man, but not a man that Dorsey entirely corrupted. He was Dorsey's man, and worked for Dorsey, and when he testified here to facts that went to Dorsey's detriment, he did it under the greatest possible pain, as was evident from the manner in which he gave his testimony.

Mr. CARPENTER. If Dorsey partially corrupted him you finished the work.

Mr. MERRICK. Order for expedition June 3, 1879, founded on these petitions. February 11, 1881, order to increase four trips. Bear in mind that in some of these cases I claim specific elements of fraud; but in all of them the general elements of the fraud that tainted the transactions all the way through up to and after April 1.

Route 41119, from Toquerville to Adaiville: Here is an order to which I desire to call special attention. June 25, 1879, Peck's oath was filed, dated January 22, 1879. The body of the oath was written by Miner. This was one of those distributed blanks. The figures were filled in by Rerdell by direction of S. W. Dorsey, who told him to put in anything, but keep the proportion of 150 to 250 per cent. That is set forth in the indictment as an overt act, and that, my associate informs me, Mr. Ingersoll admitted in his speech came within the statute.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think I admitted it was filed within the time.

Mr. MERRICK. The filing is the crime as to the oath. You will bear in mind that it is not necessary for you to find all these overt acts. One single overt act done by any one of these men after the 23d day of May, 1879, is all you need find. All you need find is the filing of that oath on the 25th day of June, 1879. It only requires one overt act. The conspiracy is proved by a multitude of acts out of which you draw the conclusion of a conspiracy. But, may it please your honor, unless the law has been modified by the late decision of the Supreme Court, and I think likely it has, in addition to the conspiracy there must be one overt act committed by one conspirator to make it criminal.

The COURT. What decision of the Supreme Court has modified that?

Mr. MERRICK. The Brittan case.

Mr. WILSON. That recent case.

Mr. MERRICK. In the Brittan case the Supreme Court decided that the overt act was not necessary to constitute a part of the body of the crime of the conspiracy, as I understood the decision when I looked at it. That is a matter that will be discussed before your honor. I shall not disturb the ruling made by your honor, or rather I shall not ask you to disturb it at all, but I will treat the overt act as part of the body of the crime. The Supreme Court did not seem so to treat it. It states that the conspiracy being proved, an overt act is, as it were, a sort of locus penitentiae, but does not constitute an essential element of the crime.

The COURT. I glanced at that decision, but I acknowledge I did not read it critically. As I understood it I did not find any doctrine laid down there that gave a shock to my convictions at all. It was all consistent with my previous conclusions that there must be a conspiracy and an overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy. If the conspiracy was formed and was not followed by an overt act there would be nothing to punish. There would be no crime. The overt act must be an act in pursuance of the conspiracy. Some other act not done in pursuance of the conspiracy of course would not be an overt act.

[Mr. Wilson rose.]

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Wilson, excuse me. I do not propose to discuss it, and would rather not interrupt the line of my argument for any suggestions in regard to it.

Mr. WILSON. I am not going to make any suggestions, but only to say that at a certain point in my argument I was going to take it up—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Will you allow me to go on?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not propose to take it up now.

Mr. WILSON. I was just going to say to the court that we would like an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. MERRICK. It is a matter of law, and you will have an opportunity to discuss it.

June 25, 1879, petition 4 D filed, and altered by writing in seven trips. 5 D written by Rerdell, and some of the names probably fictitious, says one of our witnesses. July 8, 1879, order for increase and expedition. You will bear in mind that an overt act may have been committed by Rerdell just as well as anybody else. He is one of these conspirators, pleading guilty, and whilst in an ordinary case it is necessary for the jury to find two men guilty, for one man cannot conspire with himself, yet where one conspirator has pleaded guilty to the indictment the jury may find any other one guilty along with him. Any act done by Rerdell in execution of this conspiracy, whether done on his own motion or at the suggestion of S. W. Dorsey, is an act to be considered by you the same as if it had been done by any other one of these parties.

Now, on the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route, I call your attention particularly to this overt act: On May 24, 1879, one day after the time fixed in the indictment as the date when the conspiracy was flagrant, Peck's oath, dated January 22, 1879, was filed. Miner wrote the body, and Rerdell filled in the figures after the date of the oath by direction of S. W. Dorsey, and on that oath was passed an order for increase and expedition.

Mr. KER. Mr. Ingersoll admitted that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I admitted the filing as within the period, but I did not admit the affidavit to be untrue.

Mr. MERRICK. This is one of Peck's oaths which is one of the blanks distributed at the time of the division, and the jurat is dated January 22, 1879. It was written by Miner. It was filled in by Rerdell. Dorsey ordered it to be done. You then have on that oath of Peck, as participants in its manipulation, Rerdell, Miner, and S. W. Dorsey. The evidence is conclusive that that oath was fraudulently manufactured, filled up, and illegally dealt with, and as you must find that it was filed on the 24th of May, 1879, that may be regarded in itself as a final fact in your inquiry as to overt acts. For as you need find only one overt act committed by any one of the defendants in order to consummate the crime of conspiracy as denounced by the law and as this overt act cannot be questioned in any of its features or forms or substance, its illegality or its immorality or the fact that it was perpetrated by the parties, or that it was perpetrated within the time, you may regard that overt act as an end to your inquiry in reference to overt acts. But I will go on further:

Route 44155, from The Dalles to Baker City: Order June 27, 1879, to increase four trips. Here comes another order to which I wish to call particular attention.

Route 44160, Canyon City to Camp McDermitt. July 16, 1880.

Mr. BLISS. What year?

Mr. MERRICK. 1880. Petition 21 H, written by Miner. Petition 29 H, written by Miner, with the name of E. Hall and five others forged. Order to increase four trips, July 16, 1880.

Route 46132, from Julian to Colton: June 24, 1879, order for increase and expedition.

Route 46247, from Redding to Alturas: February 11, 1881, order to increase to seven trips. Major and Culverhouse swore that they were carrying the mail in less time than the order required. Many thousand dollars were taken from the Treasury by the order for expedition, and yet, in point of fact, the mail was being carried more expeditiously than the order required it to be carried.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What is the date of the order?

Mr. MERRICK. February 11, 1881. Increased to seven trips, doubling up the expedition previously made.

Now, gentlemen, you see that all along up to the time that this investigation began and the law interposed to arrest this wild carnival of corruption these orders were being passed and these contractors were upon these contracts and orders robbing the Treasury of the United States. I therefore say again, gentlemen, that if there was in reference to these contracts originally a conspiracy prior to April, 1879, as I think I have conclusively shown you, then on the 1st day of April, 1879, the division was not for the purpose of stopping the robbery, but to facilitate its further development and to realize the profits from it by conducting it under a different system, each party rendering reciprocal aid in the process of carrying on the business, and there flowed one continuous and uninterrupted current of corruption until stopped by investigation and judicial inquiry and the indictment of the malefactors. I have shown you on these routes a sufficient number of overt acts to render any failure of justice by reason of an inability to find their commission an utter impossibility.

If your honor please, it is near the hour of adjournment.

The COURT. I will consult your comfort. We will take our recess now. I suppose it will be an hour and ten minutes, then.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir. I shall finish in half an hour or an hour, I think, unless Brother Bliss makes me go into some matters I do not want to go into.

At this point (12 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court and gentlemen of the jury: Appreciating that I have detained you already in this argument almost too long, too long for your own patience, which has been singularly manifested throughout by a careful and deliberate attention, and too long for my own strength, which I have had to press up to its utmost capacity in order that I might fully perform the important duty imposed upon me by our common Government, I will hasten to its close. There are many things that I have in my notes about which I would like to speak to you, but which I will pass by without comment. I have gone over all that was important and all that was material, and I think that I have, as I promised in the beginning, made the questions involved so plain that all of you can see distinctly the entire case as claimed by the Government. The learned counsel who addressed you last on behalf of the defendants, on two or three occasions in the course of his speech, remarked, speaking of himself, that he must kill this witness and that witness, and once or twice said that he must keep on killing. If he has succeeded in killing all the witnesses for the Government, the destruction of whom is essential to the defense, he has the fortune now of standing in the midst of quite an extensive burial ground. He claims to have killed Rerdell. In addition to him it was necessary that he should kill Boone, necessary that he should kill Moore, and necessary that he should kill Walsh. In order to get rid of the existence of the red books of Rerdell and the memorandum, which was the substance giving the shadow in the shape of an entry upon those books, it was necessary that he should kill Donnelly and Mr. Gibbs, and that he should sorely wound Mrs. Cushman. To protect John W. Dorsey it was necessary that he should kill McBean and McLellan and Cable and Lounsberry and Lambert and Major. To protect his own clients it was necessary that he should paralyze their cross-examination side, beginning by paralyzing Miner's cross-examination, John W. Dorsey's cross-examination, Vaile's cross-examination, Stephen W. Dorsey's cross-examination, and Brady's cross-examination. It was necessary that he should then destroy French, on the Kearney and Kent route, and Nephi Johnson, on the Toquerville and Adairville route. I think, gentlemen, that all these witnesses whose destruction was necessary to the defense, and whose death we might have anticipated, according to the promise of the learned counsel, are not destroyed, but still live, and speak to you in such emphatic and distinct tones that you cannot fail to hear them, and in such a manner that you cannot fail to believe them.

Reviewing the entire case from its beginning to the end, as I have presented it to you, from the inception of the conspiracy down to the time when the last orders were made charged in this indictment, what will be your course when you retire to the jury-room? First among the facts of the case, looming up prominently and distinctly, to be analyzed and reduced into its original elements, is this great fact: These routes in the indictment, originally taken at an additional cost of $41,135, were, in a little more than a year, through the exercise of an extraordinary and an exceptional power on the part of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, raised to a cost of $448,670 per annum. In view of that great and prominent fact your first inquiry will be, has the United States been defrauded? Second, if it has, by whom? Third, for whose benefit? Fourth, by what process? Fifth, was there a conspiracy to defraud for the benefit of these individuals by the processes suggested?

Now, gentlemen, with a few more words I shall finish my task.

It is certainly true that no nation has ever gone down whose fall was not more or less directly occasioned by the corruption of its public functionaries in the execution of their public trusts. The official life of a nation should be, and very generally is, the reflex of the moral sense and of the intellectual development of its people. If official delinquency is permitted to go unwhipped of justice, the people become participators in the crimes of their officials. Then we know that there is some great calamity at hand, loss of liberty, loss of nationality, loss of national prestige, civil strife, or internal dissension. One of the most difficult duties which those charged with the administration of public affairs are called upon to perform is that of bringing their colleagues in office and sometimes the leaders in their own party to justice for their crimes of venality and corruption. The sympathies of partisanship and party policy condone a multitude of sins; and it is often inculcated as a maxim of duty in the interests of political organizations that dissensions are not to be provoked and party supremacy endangered by the prosecution of those who claim that their contribution to party success entitles them to immunity from punishment for their corrupt practices, and even demand a longer lease of power wherein to continue their criminal practices.

Mr. Ingersoll has said in his speech to the jury :

These men who are persecuting S. W. Dorsey seem to forget who he is and what he has been. Yet men disgrace the position that Stephen W. Dorsey helped to give them by attacking him.

Can such language be heard in a court of justice before a jury in defense of a criminal without creating consternation among a free people, standing each equal to the other before the law? For me, I regard the demands of our country as above those of party. The true patriot and the lover of his country, of his country's honor, and of her freedom, cannot more readily pass by without condemnation the delinquencies of the officials of his own political household than he can those of any hostile organization. For the official delinquencies of political opponents the hostile political organization is not responsible. But for the official delinquencies of its own partisans the organization that put them in power and continues them in power, after knowing their criminality, is responsible. To repress and punish them is the highest moral duty as well as a duty requiring the manifestation of the highest moral courage. The people of these United States with one universal and harmonious voice, irrespective of party associations, and regardless of party affiliations and party prejudices, will, through all time, pay their high tribute of honor and devotion to an Administration which, convinced of the guilt of those who, according to their claims, have helped it to power, now pursues them through the judicial tribunals of the Republic to achieve that retributive justice which their crimes demand at the hands of the violated law.

It is well known to you that my political sentiments are not in accord with those that control the administration of the Government of our country at this time, and therefore I may speak with freedom. I deem it my duty, as it is my pleasure, to pay a just tribute to the gentlemen whose unpleasant function it has been to employ the power with which they have been intrusted, to pursue and punish the corruption of members of their own political household. It has been a most unpleasant duty on the part of the Chief Executive and of his official advisers to arraign before the bar of justice men who have stood high in the councils of their party, and whose energies have so greatly contributed to the success of that party. But it is infinitely to their honor that they have not sought to evade that high duty, and that the violent and libelous and tempestuous assaults made upon them have been ineffectual to swerve them from the line of duty even in the estimation of a hair. True to their country and to their country's cause, they have not hesitated to sink all the demands of party at the call of public duty, and by this course paid a high tribute to the inherent, grand, and lofty manhood of the American people. Such appeals as Mr. Ingersoll has addressed to this jury, and through his speech in this court to the people of the United States, can only redound to his own discredit, and, showing the low and narrow basis upon which he would put the vindication of his clients, goes forth like the wail of despair from a victim conscious that his hour has come.

Your verdict, gentlemen, in this case will be one of the most important that has ever been rendered in this country. It will arrest forever the wild carnival of official corruption where those engaged expect to secure themselves against the law by the extent of the wealth they accumulate by their crimes, or it will give unrestrained license to those disgraceful and criminal revels. Whatever there has been in the past of official corruption in our country calculated to disgrace and dishonor the people and soil the fair record of the nation rises up now before you, and the virtuous portion of our inhabitants appeal to you for their vindication, and most earnestly pray that you will stop these official speculations by making theft in official places a dangerous thing. Men in office suppose that if they can perpetrate frauds of sufficient magnitude to accumulate large wealth, the gilded hand may come into the court or into the jury-box, and that they may stand up and defy the law, as these men have proclaimed their defiance of it through the public press. Your verdict will stop this, gentlemen, and announce to the world that the time has come when purity in office shall be the rule in the public affairs of our country; or if not that, your verdict will say, "Go on, revelers. The country pays for the music. Fling high in your wild dance and rob without fear of retributive justice the treasury of the United States."

Let me say to you, gentlemen, that in a case like this whilst you are trying the defendants the country is trying you. It is trying you and me and the court. It is sitting in solemn judgment upon the manner in which judicial authority and justice are administered in the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to ask the court if it is proper for the counsel to say to the jury that the country is trying them.

Mr. MERRICK. The country tries every juror in a case in which it is interested.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am asking the court if that is proper.

The COURT. [To Mr. Merrick.] You had better leave that to the court.

Mr. MERRICK. The jury sit under a solemn obligation to perform their duty. Every man's every act in life is being tried before a jury of his own acquaintances and in his own circle. He walks and he sits and he talks before a jury; and as he walks and as he sits and as he talks, so that jury finds him honorable or dishonorable, and whether their verdict be expressed or not, he feels that justice is being done to him, and writhes under the sting, though he knows not whence it comes, or rejoices in the glory, though he knows not whose hand decorates him. This case is known all over the nation, and as you sit and as you speak so will be the verdict of your countrymen. But above and beyond that, as your first obligation, remember you are being tried by your own consciences. Yield to the voice of sympathy and give a verdict responsive to tears or sorrow, and that verdict will in calmer moments disturb the profoundest and the sweetest sleep. Give a verdict according to the law and the facts on the evidence, a verdict which hereafter, however examined by you, will be considered a just verdict, visiting punishment if need be upon the guilty, protecting the country, upholding the supremacy of the law, and maintaining integrity in office, and the recollection of that verdict coming over you in a restless night, when the lips are fevered and the heart beats high with an unhealthy throb, will bring you repose and sleep. The voice of your conscience will be to you as the voice of God, saying, You have done your duty.

For myself, gentlemen, I stated to you when I commenced this argument that I should deal fairly with the case and frankly and honestly with the defendants. I stated that I should deal with you and with them as I would in a private transaction. I have done so to the best of my ability. I have done it conscientiously. I have no word to take back. I have presented no thought the shade of which I would change. I feel that I have done my duty faithfully, honestly, and fairly; and I now ask you, gentlemen, as I believe you will, to do yours in the same way.

I demand from you, according to my conscientious conviction of the requirements of the facts in this case, a verdict on those facts of guilty against all these defendants.

I demand this verdict on behalf of the people of the United States, whose public Treasury these defendants have robbed.

I demand it on behalf of integrity in the execution of official trust, which they have disregarded.

I demand it on behalf of the supremacy of the law of the land, which they have defied with arrogance and spurned with contempt.

In fine, I demand it on behalf of the truth, honor, and virtue of the American people, which these men by their criminal and nefarious conduct have stained and blackened and exposed to the scorn, the derision, and the contempt of the world.

May it please your honor, thanking you for the courtesy with which you have listened to me during the progress of the argument, and thanking you, gentlemen of the jury, for the patient, careful, and thoughtful attention you have given to me during its entire progress, I respectfully submit the case.

[Manifestations of applause promptly checked by the officers of the court.]

The COURT. I suppose both sides probably have their prayers ready. If so, I should be glad to have them submitted.

Mr. BLISS. I have here the prayers on behalf of the Government, which I will hand to the court and am ready to submit if the other side are ready to submit theirs. We will take the directions of the court, after any suggestions that may be made from the other side with regard to the matter, whether we shall go on with the discussion of them, or whether your honor will receive them from both sides and let them go into the record, and inform us either now or on Monday morning whether you desire a discussion of them.

The COURT. It would be a convenience to the court if I could have both sets of prayers for the purpose of looking at them between this and Monday.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it be convenient for the court or convenient for the counsel to say what they wish to say in regard to these prayers to-morrow? I suppose it will not be necessary for the jury to be present. I do not know how that will be.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, no; not at all necessary.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have not spoken to my brethren about it.

The COURT. I am quite willing to hold court to-morrow for that purpose.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to do so.

Mr. MERRICK. Would not your honor prefer to take the prayers and have to-morrow to look them over, and then indicate what points you would like to have argued?

Mr. BLISS. There is another point that perhaps I may make, which Mr. Merrick has not referred to. We, of course, desire on the part of the Government the assistance of Mr. Merrick in any argument that there may be upon the law. I think your honor will agree with me that Mr. Merrick is not in such a condition as he ought to be in to begin another discussion so soon as to-morrow. I hope therefore if there is to be any discussion of the law it may not come until Monday.

The COURT. I appreciate very fully the facts mentioned in regard to

Mr. Merrick. He commenced his argument on Monday, the 26th of May. To be sure he was relieved on the Wednesday following and had a rest of one day and the usual rest of Saturday and Sunday ; but altogether he has been upon the floor nine days, and of course he must be very much exhausted. I am inclined to favor the suggestion made by Colonel Bliss that the court adjourn until Monday.

Mr. DAVIDGE. There is one suggestion I would be glad to make, may it please your honor. Our prayers may depend, and undoubtedly will depend to some extent, upon the prayers of the Government. We would be glad to be furnished copies of such prayers as they propose to submit to the court.

Mr. MERRICK. Have you submitted any yet ?

Mr. DAVIDGE. We have not submitted any. I desired to hand them in, but——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Would it not be better for the defendants to submit all the prayers and to have them go in the record with those for the Government, so that they will be printed by to-morrow morning ?

The COURT. If you are prepared on the side of the defense I should be glad to have both sets of prayers submitted at the same time. Of course neither side has had the opportunity of examining the prayers of the other side. After that has been done the court sees that suggestions may occur to the minds of counsel that will lead to additional prayers on both sides, in consequence of the comparison of the prayers. I would not preclude counsel on either side from adding to the prayers so submitted to-day.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I have some and will cheerfully submit them ; but I supposed Mr. Merrick would take all day, and my prayers are at my house. I am perfectly willing to give the other side a copy of them.

The COURT. I hope they are in somebody else's handwriting than your own or printed.

Mr. DAVIDGE. They are all in print.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, let me suggest that we can arrange the matter in this way : Those that are in court can be handed to the stenographer and those that are not in court can be sent to him and put in to-day's record, which will be printed by to-morrow morning, and thus all the prayers will be accessible to both sides.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think it would be fair to give either side liberty to put in additional prayers.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

The COURT. That I have already said.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I understand my Brothers Henkle and Chandler also have some prayers.

Mr. BLISS. Let them all go to the stenographer.

Mr. DAVIDGE. They may be handed to the stenographer.

The COURT. We will get them some time to-morrow.

Mr. MERRICK. We will get the record to-morrow morning.

Mr. HENKLE. We may present such additional prayers as we think necessary on Monday morning.

The COURT. I can foresee that additional prayers may be suggested between this and the argument. I do not wish to make any ruling that will limit counsel on either side to the prayers now offered.

Mr. WILSON. I want to say for the benefit of counsel on the other side and the court, that we have some prayers, but, like Mr. Davidge, supposed Mr. Merrick would occupy the entire day and did not bring them into court. I will be glad to hand them to the stenographer and let them be printed so that the Government can have the benefit of them.

The COURT. If you will please to do that then, gentlemen, on both sides, it will be convenient for me and will relieve the counsel on both sides.

Mr. HENKLE. Can that be done to morrow morning, your honor?

Mr. MERRICK. You had better hand them in this evening.

Mr. HENKLE. Can they not be handed in on Saturday?

Mr. BLISS. The difficulty is this: the night force will be at the printing office to-night and you will not probably get them until Monday morning unless they are sent in this evening.

Mr. WILSON. We will want the benefit of them in the morning. I want you to have the benefit of ours and I want to have the benefit of yours.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We only want them for the points. The form can be modified afterwards.

The COURT. The right to modify your prayers will exist up to the last moment. I assume that they are substantially ready for the court now.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; I presume theirs are, and ours are ready, I know.

Mr. BLISS. Ours are in print.

Mr. WILSON. We have not a printing office, your honor.

The COURT. I suppose you will insist on paying for the printing.

Mr. BLISS. [To Mr. Wilson.] You left us something.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope you will leave that to the Government when you quit.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is doubtful if they will.

The COURT. The Government belongs to us all. Now, the next question I am in the dark altogether about. The jury, of course, need not be present during the argument on these prayers. Can you give me an intimation of the probable length of the argument?

Mr. DAVIDGE. I hope your honor will limit the time. We think we can discuss these prayers in two or three hours on our side, and I presume the Government can do the same thing.

Mr. BLISS. I think there will be no trouble in closing the argument on Monday, if the defense confine themselves to anything like the time they intimate.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am willing the court should limit us to Monday.

Mr. BLISS. If your honor will limit us to Monday, we will divide the time with the other side.

The COURT. Gentlemen of the jury, you will be excused from attendance until Tuesday morning. We hope to get through with the dry work of discussion of the law on Monday, and to be able to say something to you upon the subject of those prayers on Tuesday morning. We shall not require your attendance until that time. There is nothing further I believe to-day. Adjourn the court.

At this point (2 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until Monday morning next, June 11, at 11 o'clock.

The prayers furnished to the stenographer, in accordance with the agreement of counsel, are as follows :

PRAYERS PRESENTED ON BEHALF OF THE PROSECUTION.

FIRST.

To constitute a conspiracy it is not necessary that two or more persons should meet together and enter into an explicit or formal agreement for an unlawful scheme, or that they should directly, in word or in writing, state what the unlawful scheme is to be, and the details of the plan or means by which the unlawful combination is to be made effective. It is sufficient if two or more persons, in any manner or through any contrivance, passively or tacitly, come to a mutual understanding to accomplish the combination and unlawful design. In other words, where an unlawful end is sought to be effected, and two or more persons, actuated by a common purpose of accomplishing that end, work together in any way in furtherance of the unlawful scheme, such persons become conspirators, although the part which any one of them is to take in the conspiracy is a subordinate one, or is to be executed at a remote distance from the other conspirators.

SECOND.

A conspiracy can seldom be proved by direct testimony. Persons combining for the execution of an unlawful scheme do not ordinarily expose themselves to public observation; and the fact of the combination can, therefore, as a general rule, be established only by proof of the acts of the several parties in such combination, and the relation of those acts to each other, and their tendency by their united effect to produce a common result. In other words, where the jury find that the acts of several parties charged with a conspiracy are the co-ordinates of each other, and needed for the consummation of the criminal purpose charged in the indictment as the object of the conspiracy, they are at liberty to find that the various parties performing those several and respective acts were engaged in a conspiracy to produce the unlawful result, although there may be no direct evidence whatever before them to show that such parties ever entered into any agreement to accomplish such unlawful purpose.

THIRD.

There is no criminality in a confederation of individuals to bid for and procure contracts in the mail service of the United States. But where it is shown that the means proposed to be used by such confederation for the purpose of gaining profit out of such contracts are such as are declared by the law to be criminal, such as the presentation to the Post-Office Department of false and forged petitions for the increase or expedition of the service, or the making or presentation to the department of false affidavits, then such combination or confederation becomes illegal in its character, and the persons composing it become liable to criminal prosecution as conspirators. If it further appears that such persons do any overt act in execution of such illegal combination, such as the presentation of a claim for the payment of money to them founded upon any order or orders obtained upon such false affideceits or petitions, such persons are guilty of conspiracy under the act of Congress enacted to punish conspiracy to defraud the United States. Moreover, any one thereafter entering into such illegal combination becomes a member thereof, and liable to the penalties denounced by law against it, equally as if he had been originally connected with the scheme.

FOURTH.

In determining the question of the existence of a conspiracy, the jury will take into consideration, as a very material fact, the relation of the parties to one another, their personal and business association with each other, and all the facts in evidence that tend to show what transpired between them at or before the time of the alleged combination, as well as the acts performed by each party severally subsequently to such alleged combination in respect of the subject-matter of the alleged conspiracy; and from these, together with all the other facts before them, the jury will determine whether a combination in fact existed, and whether such combination was illegal in its inception, or became illegal at any subsequent time.

FIFTH.

If a conspiracy is found to exist, any division of the property which formed the subject-matter of the conspiracy does not relieve the parties from the joint liability to the criminal law as conspirators; and if a combination is found to have existed for an unlawful purpose, although there may have been a subsequent division of the property of the combination between the several participants in severalty, yet if it is further found that at the time of making such division or partition it was agreed that each party should do any act needed to enhance the value of the property set off to any other party, and that thereafter there was an interchange of efforts by the several parties, through unlawful and illegal processes, to enhance the value of the property so set off to the several parties respectively, such agreement and every illegal act so done are evidence of the existence and continuance of the conspiracy; and any such act, though performed by one under such agreement, will bind all engaged in the conspiracy.

SIXTH.

The law provides that compensation for additional service in carrying the mail shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service. This provision is a declaration of the limit to which compensation may reach. The contractor is not necessarily entitled to the utmost limit of compensation allowed by law. The amount of compensation, within that limit, is left to the sound discretion and judgment of the executive officer who has charge of the subject. The law likewise provides that no extra allowance shall be made for any increase or expedition for carrying the mail, unless additional stock and carriers are thereby made necessary; and in such case the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation under the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution; and the stock and carriers necessarily employed in the execution of the original contract mean those then actually in service.

If the jury find from the evidence that the defendant, Thomas J. Brady, was the executive officer having in charge the branches of the mail service specified in these laws, and that, in the performance of his duties as such executive officer, he knowingly and purposely allowed for any expedition on the routes specified in this indictment a greater sum than was necessary and proper, it is a circumstance strongly tending to establish the charge of a corrupt motive on his part.

Again, the law provides that no compensation shall be paid for any additional regular service rendered before the issuing of the order under which such service is to be rendered. If the jury finds from the evidence that the defendant, Thomas J. Brady, issued an order awarding compensation for additional service upon any of the routes named in the indictment subsequently to the time when such service was rendered, such order was illegal and prohibited by law; and the jury will regard it as a material circumstance in the consideration of the charge of corruption as made against said Brady.

SEVENTH.

In considering the acts of the various defendants the jury will bear in mind:

- 1st. That forgery is a crime under the law.
- 2nd. That to alter in any particular, after it has been signed, a paper required or authorized by law to be executed, is a forgery.
- 3rd. That to file any such forged paper in a department of the Government, to obtain its action thereon, is a crime.
- 4th. That a false oath or affidavit, filed in a department of the Government, is criminal under the statutes of the United States, and punishable like forgery.
- 5th. That the filing of a false, fraudulent, altered, or forged paper in any department of the Government, with the design and intention thereby to deceive any executive officer of the Government with reference to a matter subject to his jurisdiction, for the benefit of the person filing the paper or causing it to be filed, is a crime under the statute law of the United States.
- 6th. That the presentation of any claim to an executive department of the Government for payment, when said claim is fraudulent and so known to be by the person presenting the same, is a crime against the United States.
- 7th. That the presentation for payment to any department of the Government of a claim against the United States founded upon fraud, or upon a contract obtained by fraud, is a crime, if the person presenting the same or causing it to be presented is cognizant of the fraud.

EIGHTH.

If the jury find that any of the orders of increase on the routes specified in the indictment were made on petitions, part of the signatures to which were forged by any one of the defendants, and on affidavits made by any one of the defendants, and subsequently to the time when they were sworn to, interlined, erased, or filled up, or changed by any other of the defendants and made to speak falsely, and then filed in the Post-Office Department, these circumstances would afford strong if not conclusive evidence of a criminal combination among the parties participating in such transactions, and benefiting by the orders obtained in consequence thereof.

NINTH.

The duty of making contracts on post-routes and changing the same by increasing or expediting the service thereon, is, under the regulations of the Post-Office Department and the acts of Congress giving such regulations the authority of law, committed to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and he is responsible therefor; and the orders passed by him in the premises, although entered upon the journal which is signed by the Postmaster-General, derive their authority primarily from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General; and if the jury find that the orders in evidence in this case, as the orders of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, were not made by him in obedience to instructions specifically given in that regard by the Postmaster-General, then the Second Assistant Postmaster-General can in no way protect himself from any and all of the consequences, civil and criminal, of such orders by reason of the fact that the Postmaster-General signed the journal of the department in which these orders are recorded.

TENTH.

Section 3679 of the Revised Statutes provides as follows: "No department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriation made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriation." Such being the statute of the United States, no executive officer of the Post-Office Department could exceed in actual expenditure or contract for expenditures in any one year the amount by law appropriated for that year; and if the jury find from the evidence that the defendant Thomas J. Brady, whilst Second Assistant Postmaster-General, exceeded the appropriation of a year, either by actual expenditure, or by contract to pay in the future, upon any of the routes specified in this indictment, such expenditure or contract to pay was a violation of the law, and beyond the power of the executive officer attempting to make the same, and any such violation of law, if found by the jury, may be taken into consideration by them in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant, Thomas J. Brady.

ELEVENTH.

In the second section of the act of Congress of April 7, 1880 (chapter 48), it is provided, "That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract either now existing or hereafter given to a rate of pay exceeding fifty per centum upon the contract as originally let." If the jury find that upon any of the routes mentioned in the indictment, the defendant, Brady, prior to the seventh day of April, 1880, made an order for expediting and the allowance of increased pay and compensation therefor, and after the seventh day of April, 1880, the defendant, Brady, made another order to increase the number of trips, and allowing as pay for the increased trips a sum of money based upon the then existing cost of the trips including the expedition, that is, allowing for each of the trips so added a sum of money equal to the original cost of a trip with the cost of expedition added thereto, such an order and allowance of pay was a violation of the spirit of the law which the jury may take into account in considering the motive of Brady and the other testimony and circumstances concerning the charge laid in the indictment.

TWELFTH.

Section 3960 of the Revised Statutes provides, that "when any such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor shall be expressed in the order and entered upon the books of the department." If the jury find that the defendant, Brady, made an order or orders for additional service and reduction of time, or expedition, upon any of the routes mentioned in the indictment, and for the allowance of increased pay and compensation therefor, without separating the amounts in each order so as to express in the order the amount allowed for such additional service, such order or orders were unlawful, and the jury may take the fact, along with the other testimony, into consideration in determining whether the defendant, Brady, made such order or orders in pursuance of the conspiracy to defraud the United States with which he is charged in the indictment.

THIRTEENTH.

If the jury find that the testimony of the witness, Rerdell, though that of an accomplice, is corroborated by other testimony in the case and circumstances that have been adduced in evidence, such testimony is not to be discredited because it is that of an accomplice. Therefore, if the jury are satisfied that said testimony is true in any material part thereof, and that in such material part it has been confirmed by unimpeachable evidence, such confirmation affords reasonable ground for belief that such testimony is true in all its other parts.

FOURTEENTH.

Although the defendants are authorized by law to testify as witnesses on their own behalf, yet their testimony, like that of accomplices, is not to be regarded without suspicion; and the jury, in weighing its credibility, may take into consideration the deep interest which they have in their own acquittal and the great temptation under which they are to procure such acquittal by disregard of the sanctity of an oath. Therefore, if the jury find in the present case that the testimony of the defendants who have appeared as witnesses on their own behalf is not full and explicit, or if they find it to be evasive, or if they find that the defendants, upon cross-examination, have failed to testify fully and to remember such facts as must necessarily have been within their knowledge and recollection, then they will be justified in refusing to give to such testimony the credence due to disinterested witnesses; and they will not regard the testimony of any two or more witnesses so testifying and corroborating each other as entitled to any greater credence than that of one alone.

FIFTEENTH.

When a defendant in a criminal cause becomes a witness on his own behalf, and has been notified to produce books and papers admitted by him or shown to have been in his possession, and which, if produced, would have been competent evidence in the cause, and upon cross-examination such defendant witness reiterates his refusal to produce such books and papers, the jury is entitled to presume that such books and papers, if produced, would have disclosed evidence disadvantageous to such defendant, and that such failure casts suspicion on all the other evidence adduced by said defendant, and is a circumstance tending to prove his guilt.

SIXTEENTH.

And the jury is further instructed that the manner in which the counsel for the defendant, S. W. Dorsey, offered to produce said books and papers should in no way lessen or mitigate the force of any presumption or inference to be drawn from the non-production of the same, for the reason that such offer was so qualified that the court could not recognize it, even if counsel for the Government had accepted it, and the jury will therefore regard such offer only as further evidence, establishing by the admission of the said defendant, of his possession of the said books and papers, and the fact that they were within reach and within the power of the said defendant to produce the same during the trial, if he had thought proper to do so; and the jury will therefore draw from the non-production of said books and papers the presumptions and inferences as directed in the instructions heretofore given by the court.

SEVENTEENTH.

A conspiracy is rarely, if ever, proved by positive testimony. When a crime of high magnitude is about to be perpetrated by a combination of individuals, they do not act openly, but covertly and secretly. The purpose formed is known only to those who enter into it. Their guilt can generally be proved only by circumstantial evidence. This kind of evidence often satisfies a jury of the guilt of the accused. It is said by some writers on evidence that such circumstances are stronger than positive proof. A witness swearing positively, it is said, may misapprehend the facts or swear falsely, but that circumstances cannot lie. The common design is the essence of the charge; and this may be made to appear, when the defendants steadily pursue the same object, whether acting separately or together, by common or different means, all leading to the same unlawful result. And where prima facie evidence has been given of a combination, the acts or confessions of one are evidence against all.

EIGHTEENTH.

In a case of conspiracy one alone cannot be found guilty. There must be two or more.

But in this case, one of the defendants having pleaded guilty of the conspiracy as charged in the indictment, the jury is instructed that they may bring in a verdict of guilty against any one or more of his codefendants whom they may find from the evidence to have been guilty with him in said conspiracy.

NINETEENTH.

If the jury find that James W. Bosler, R. P. Williamson, L. P. Williamson, Charles Pelham, or either of them, was a person whose testimony would have been material on the part of one or more of the defendants, and was a witness, or were witnesses, that should have been called to testify on behalf of such defendant or defendants, and was or were not called to so testify, the failure to call such witness or witnesses is a circumstance for the jury to consider when deciding upon the evidence against defendant or defendants.

TWENTIETH.

If the jury find that William H. Betts was a witness whose testimony would have been material on the part of the defendants, and when called to the stand and examined as a witness on the part of the defendants, was not examined or interrogated upon questions that were material in the issue, and in contradiction of the testimony given by A. W. Moore after the foundation having been laid for such contradiction, upon cross-examination, the failure to so examine or interrogate him raises the presumption that the testimony of the witness Betts in that respect would not have been favorable to the defendants, and is a circumstance for the jury to consider when deciding upon the evidence against the defendants.

PRAYERS PRESENTED ON BEHALF OF THE DEFENSE.

FIRST.

It is the duty of the jury first to determine whether there was such a conspiracy as that set out in the indictment. And in considering this question they are to start with the presumption that there was no such conspiracy; and if they find the existence of such conspiracy, their finding must be based solely upon the evidence in the case, which must be sufficiently strong to overcome the presumption against it and to satisfy their minds of its existence beyond a reasonable doubt; and if they can account for all the facts and circumstances in the case upon any hypothesis consistent with the non-existence of such conspiracy, it will be their duty to find that there was no such conspiracy, in which event they will, of course, find the defendants not guilty without further inquiry.

SECOND.

A conspiracy may be formed by the separate acts and declarations accompanying acts of the several persons charged with conspiracy; but such acts must tend to the accomplishment of a common purpose, and the purpose must be that set out in the indictment. Acts of individual defendants in the prosecution of their own business are not to be considered by the jury, unless they find from the evidence the existence of such conspiracy, and that such acts were done in pursuance of the common purpose set out in the indictment, and for the joint benefit of the members of the conspiracy.

THIRD.

It is not criminal nor unlawful for a contractor for carrying the mails upon the star routes to write or cause to be written and circulated petitions and recommendations for the increase or expedition of such routes; but, on the contrary, such acts are lawful and legitimate. The jury should presume all such petitions and recommendations were honestly made and filed, unless they are shown by the evidence to have been false, and made and filed for a fraudulent purpose.

FOURTH.

Where petitions, signed by citizens or military officers living or stationed along any of the routes named in the indictment, for increase of service or expedition had been filed in the Post-Office Department, and the granting of the prayer of such petitions had been recommended by members of Congress representing the Territories, and by Members and Senators representing the districts and States in which such routes were located, by indorsements on the backs of such petitions, or by oral recommendations, you will presume that the orders made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General were innocently and honestly made in compliance with the prayer of said petitions and said recommendations; and this presumption can only be overcome by evidence sufficiently strong to satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt that said orders were not based upon said petitions and recommendations, but that they were corruptly made in pursuance of the conspiracy set out in the indictment.

FIFTH.

Brady had a legal right to make orders for increase of trips and for expedition of service, and where such orders were made, the legal presumption is that they were made honestly and, as he believed, for the public good; and the jury is not at liberty to presume they were made for the benefit of the contractors, or in pursuance of a corrupt conspiracy with them, unless satisfied thereof from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt.

SIXTH.

Brady had a legal right to make orders for increase of service and for expedition; and it is not the province of this jury to determine whether such orders were judiciously made or not; or whether they were extravagant or needless, unless they find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the said orders were made in pursuance of the corrupt conspiracy set out in the indictment.

SEVENTH.

If the jury are satisfied from the evidence that in the mail service it is and has for a long time been customary, where the entire interest in mail routes has been assigned to subcontractors, for such subcontractors to use the names of the original contractors in all correspondence with the department in reference to said routes, and that such custom is known and recognized by the department, the fact that Miner used the names of Peck and John W. Dorsey in correspondence with the department in reference to the routes upon which they were the original contractors, after the division and separation, and that S. W. Dorsey, or his agents, used the name of Miner in the same way, will raise no presumption of a continuation of a joint interest, provided the jury is satisfied from the evidence that said separation and transfer of interests were in fact made, and that said interests were never afterwards reunited.

EIGHTH.

There is no file mark of the Post-Office Department upon petition marked "29 H," asking for increase of service and expedition upon route No. 44160, indicating when said petition was placed on file; nor is there any other evidence of the time of filing of said paper; nor is there any evidence that it was filed before the order of expedition and increase was made. In a criminal case all presumptions are in favor of the innocence of the defendant, and in the absence of any other proof than the fact that the paper was found at the last trial of this case among the papers belonging to this route, the jury should presume that it was not one of the papers upon which the order was made.

NINTH.

If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant Vaile, when he entered into the contract bearing date the 11th of August, 1878, with the defendants John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, and John M. Peck, had never seen John W. Dorsey, M. C. Rerdell, and John M. Peck, and had but a casual acquaintance with S. W. Dorsey, it is a circumstance for the jury to consider in determining whether the said Vaile entered into a conspiracy with the other defendants named at the time he became interested in the mail routes designated in the indictment.

TENTH.

Subcontracts are authorized by law. The legal presumption is that the subcontracts named in the indictment and put in evidence by the Government are valid, and that they were made for the purpose expressed in them; and the jury should so treat them, unless they find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that they were made for an illegal or fraudulent purpose.

ELEVENTH.

If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant Vaile had no knowledge of or interest in any of the nineteen contracts mentioned in this indictment, in any manner or form, direct or indirect, either in person or as agent, prior to August 1, 1878, this fact is evidence that he was not in a conspiracy prior to that date.

TWELFTH.

Even if the jury should believe from the evidence that some of the petitions filed upon some of these nineteen routes were false and fraudulent, still the defendants should not be charged with getting up the same and filing them, unless it is clearly shown by the evidence that they got them up themselves or procured them to be gotten up for the purpose of defrauding the Government, as charged in the indictment.

It is for the jury to determine, from all the evidence in this case, whether, at any time prior to May 23, 1879, or subsequent thereto up to the filing of this indictment, Vaile and Miner and the two Dorseys and Rerdell agreed by and between themselves to write or cause to be written false and fraudulent petitions, false and untrue affidavits, as charged in the indictment, knowing the same to be false and untrue, for the purpose of defrauding the Government, or not; and if not, the jury must acquit.

THIRTEENTH.

The indictment charges that John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, and Harvey M. Vaile did, on the 23d day of May, 1879, fraudulently send, transmit, and deliver to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, among the papers relating to route No. 35015, a certain false, willful, and corrupt oath, which oath was executed on the 14th day of May, 1879, by defendant Vaile. Now, if the jury believe from the evidence that the affidavit filed among the papers on said route was not so filed on May 23, 1879, as alleged, but was filed on the 15th day of May, 1879, as the affidavit itself shows, then there is a variance between the proof offered and the allegation, and it should not be considered.

FOURTEENTH.

The affidavit of defendant Vaile, executed on May 14, 1879, and filed in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General on the 15th of the same month among the papers on route 35015, cannot be considered as an overt act, as the same is barred by the statute of limitations.

FIFTEENTH.

All affidavits and petitions filed with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General prior to May 20, 1879, are barred by the statute of limitations, and cannot be considered as evidence tending to prove a conspiracy.

SIXTEENTH.

All the affidavits and petitions filed with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General prior to May 20, 1879, are barred by the statute of limitations, and cannot be used as evidence to prove overt acts.

SEVENTEENTH.

Petitions neither false nor fraudulent do not sustain the averments in the indictment.

EIGHTEENTH.

The indictment charges but one conspiracy, and that was as to the nineteen routes named, in which it is charged the defendants had a community of interest. If this conspiracy existed at all it must have been formed before the division of the routes in April or May, 1879, as in the light of the uncontradicted evidence in the case, the defendants, after the division, never had any joint or common interest in the routes named in the indictment or any of them.

NINETEENTH.

The proof of guilt is upon the Government, and the law clothes the defendants with a presumption of innocence which attends and protects them until it is overcome by testimony which proves their guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, which means that the evidence of their guilt, as charged, must be clear, positive, and abiding, fully satisfying the minds and consciences of the jury. It is not sufficient in a criminal case to justify a verdict of guilty that there may be a strong suspicion, or even strong probabilities of guilt, but what the law requires is proof, by legal, creditable evidence of such a nature, that when it is all considered by the jury giving it its natural effect, they feel, when they have weighed and considered it all, a clear understanding and entirely satisfactory conviction of the defendants' guilt.

TWENTIETH.

Guilt cannot be fastened upon any person by the declarations or statements, oral or written, of others. Guilt must originate within a man's own heart, and it must be established by his own acts, conduct, or admissions.

TWENTY-FIRST.

The hypothesis of guilt of the offense charged in the indictment should flow naturally from the facts proven and be consistent with them all. The evidence must be such as to exclude any reasonable hypothesis but that of their guilt of the offense imputed to them; or, in other words, the facts proved must all be consistent with and point to their guilt, not only, but they must be inconsistent with their innocence.

If the evidence can be reconciled either with the theory of innocence or guilt, the law requires the jury to give the accused the benefit of the doubt, and to adopt the theory of innocence.

TWENTY-SECOND.

The charge in the indictment is that the defendants entered into a conspiracy, the object of which was to defraud the United States, and that after such conspiracy one or more of the parties thereto did some act with the intent to effect such object.

The issues to be determined are: first, whether the alleged conspiracy was entered into for such object; and secondly, whether any one or more of the parties to such conspiracy afterwards did any act with the intent to effect such object. And unless both these issues are found for the Government the verdict of the jury must be for the defendants.

To constitute conspiracy the minds of the parties must unite in a common agreement or design to commit the unlawful act charged.

While such agreement need not be formal, nor established by direct evidence, but may be established by circumstances, yet in order to convict the jury must find that such agreement was in fact entered into.

Acts and conduct on the part of the defendants, however consistent with the theory of a conspiracy, do not constitute such conspiracy, unless sufficient to satisfy the jury that there was a combination of minds and that the parties did in fact enter into the conspiracy as charged.

And in determining such fact the jury must be satisfied of the charge of conspiracy beyond a reasonable doubt; for if the evidence relied on to establish such charge can be reconciled with any reasonable hypothesis of innocence, it is the duty of the jury to find in favor of innocence.

And when it is sought to establish a criminal charge, not directly but from a variety of circumstances, or, as it is called, by circumstantial evidence, then it becomes the duty of the jury to subject each fact relied on to the test whether, though consistent with the charge, it be inconsistent with any reasonable hypothesis of innocence; and if not so inconsistent, to reject such fact as not tending in any manner to establish the charge.

TWENTY-THIRD.

The indictment is bad, because it does not aver with certainty that the object of the conspiracy was to commit a fraud against the United States denounced by statute.

TWENTY-FOURTH.

The indictment is bad, because it does not aver with certainty what fraud against the United States denounced by statute was the object of the conspiracy.

TWENTY-FIFTH.

There is but one conspiracy charged in the indictment.

TWENTY-SIXTH.

The conspiracy charged in the indictment is to defraud the United States by certain means specifically set out, and the means so set out are descriptive of the alleged conspiracy, and as much a part thereof as the act of conspiring or the object of the conspiracy. The indictment charges not only the act of conspiring, and the object to be effected, but also that certain means were agreed on whereby such object was to be effected; and hence, to warrant a conviction, the jury must be satisfied from the whole evidence not only of the act of conspiracy, and the object thereof, but also that all the means specifically set out were in fact agreed on as charged.

TWENTY-SEVENTH.

The conspiracy charged in the indictment is to defraud the United States by certain means specifically set out; and, to warrant a conviction, the jury must be satisfied from the whole evidence, and beyond a reasonable doubt, not only of the act of conspiring, and of the object of the conspiracy, but also that some one or more of the means alleged, whereby the object of the conspiracy was to be effected, was in fact agreed on as alleged.

TWENTY-EIGHTH.

By the true construction of the indictment, the conspiracy charged is alleged to have been entered into after the times when, as shown by the evidence, the mail contracts mentioned in the indictment were made and signed in behalf of the United States, and duplicate copies of said contracts had been delivered by the Postmaster-General to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department.

TWENTY-NINTH.

By the true construction of the indictment, the conspiracy charged is alleged to have been entered into after the defendants mentioned in the indictment, except Thomas J. Brady and William H. Turner, had become mutually interested in the mail contracts mentioned in the indictment, and in the moneys to be paid by the United States under said contracts, and after the said contracts were held for the mutual and pecuniary benefit of the said defendants, except as aforesaid.

THIRTIETH.

By the true construction of the indictment, the alleged conspiracy was entered into when the defendants mentioned in the indictment, except Thomas J. Brady and William H. Turner, were mutually interested in the mail contracts mentioned in the indictment, and in the moneys to be paid by the United States under said contracts, and when said contracts were held for the mutual and pecuniary benefit of the said defendants, except as aforesaid; and such mutual interest, and mutual and pecuniary benefit, must be proved to the satisfaction of the jury as existing at the time of any conspiracy.

THIRTY-FIRST.

The indictment was found under the act of Congress bearing date the 17th of May, 1879. The terms of that law are prospective, and relate to a conspiracy entered into after its date; hence, any conspiracy under the indictment must be proved to the satisfaction of the jury, and beyond any reasonable doubt, to have been entered into after the 17th of May, 1879, and to have been followed by an overt act with the intent to effect the object of such conspiracy.

THIRTY-SECOND.

Section 5440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was repealed by act of Congress of the 17th of May, 1879.

Section 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, if it applies to crimes, saves the right of prosecution as such right stood at the date of the repeal of the statute under which the right accrued. It does not keep the repealed statute alive for any other purpose than the right to prosecute for an offense already committed, and does not make any subsequent act an offense against the statute repealed.

THIRTY-THIRD.

Section 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States does not apply to crimes alleged to have been committed under a repealed statute.

THIRTY-FOURTH.

The right to prosecute under sections 5440 and 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, if it ever existed after the repeal of the act of the 17th of May, 1879, was barred by the statute of limitations before this indictment was found.

THIRTY-FIFTH.

A conspiracy before the 17th of May, 1879, followed by an act after that time to effect the object of the conspiracy, would not, even if found by the jury, sustain the indictment; and in the event of such finding their verdict must be for the defendants.

THIRTY-SIXTH.

The different acts charged by the indictment as overt acts are alleged to have been in pursuance of and to effect the object of the alleged conspiracy; and hence it is admitted that such conspiracy was entered into before the time of the earliest of said acts so charged; and when such time shall, from the evidence, be found by the jury, they can only find a conspiracy anterior to such time.

THIRTY-SEVENTH.

If the time of any act charged as an overt act shall be found by the jury to be before the 17th of May, 1879, they must acquit the defendants.

THIRTY-EIGHTH.

One of the overt acts alleged is the transmission to the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General of the affidavit in relation to route No. 40104, from Mineral Park to Pioche, and causing the same to be placed among the papers pertaining to said route.

This affidavit is set out at pages 54 and 55 of the indictment, and is in evidence. According to the file-mark thereof it was placed in said office on the 20th of December, 1878. Hence, the conspiracy, if the jury believe the said file-mark charged by the indictment, is a conspiracy entered into before said date.

And the jury are instructed to disregard all evidence on the subject of conspiracy not tending to show a conspiracy entered into before said date; and further, to disregard all evidence on the subject of conspiracy as consistent with a conspiracy entered into after as before said date; and further, to disregard all evidence on the subject of conspiracy the relation of which to a conspiracy before said date is involved in reasonable doubt.

And the jury are further instructed that if they believe said file-mark and no evidence in contradiction thereof has been given, they will consider that the issue to be determined by them is whether there was a conspiracy before the said date.

THIRTY-NINTH.

The principle of the foregoing instruction is applicable to any other act, if any, alleged by the indictment to be an overt act the true date whereof is prior to the 20th of December, 1878. The said true date found by the jury, then the conspiracy charged by the indictment, and to be determined by the jury, must be a conspiracy entered into before said date.

FORTIETH.

The alleged conspiracy, as described in the indictment, involves as an essential ingredient the fact that all the defendants named in the indictment conspired as charged, and the conspiracy of any lesser number, even if found, would not support the indictment.

FORTY-FIRST.

The alleged conspiracy, as described in the indictment, involves as an essential ingredient the fact that both Thomas J. Brady and William H. Turner conspired as charged, and the indictment cannot be sustained without proof of such fact; and the acquittal of William H. Turner is conclusive against such fact.

FORTY-SECOND.

The alleged conspiracy, as described in the indictment, involves as an essential ingredient the fact that Thomas J. Brady conspired as charged, and in the absence of proof of such fact, beyond any reasonable doubt, the indictment cannot be sustained.

FORTY-THIRD.

Even if the jury shall find that the alleged conspiracy was entered into, yet if they further find that it was so entered into more than three years before the finding of the indictment, they must find for the defendants, notwithstanding they further find that some overt act to effect the object of such conspiracy was committed by any one or more of the persons conspiring within three years before the finding of the indictment.

FORTY-FOURTH.

Even if the jury shall find that the alleged conspiracy was entered into, yet if they further find that it was entered into more than three years before the finding of the indictment, and that an overt act to effect the object of the conspiracy was committed more than three years before the finding of the indictment by any one or more of the persons conspiring, then the jury must find for the defendants, notwithstanding they find that some other overt act or acts to effect the object of the conspiracy was committed by any one or more of the persons conspiring within three years before the finding of the indictment.

FORTY-FIFTH.

The defendant Thomas J. Brady being invested by law with discretionary power in respect of the different orders given in evidence, such orders cannot be impeached in this trial for any error of judgment, however great, whether in respect of the general policy of the department, or the merits of the special matters upon which he was called upon to act and did act; but only upon the ground of a corrupt motive, in pursuance of the alleged conspiracy, in making such orders; and such motives cannot be inferred from such error of judgment, but must be established beyond a reasonable doubt by evidence aliunde.

FORTY-SIXTH.

By the true construction of the indictment, and the conspiracy as therein described, the acquittal, as shown by the record, of William H. Turner, whose part in the alleged conspiracy, as described in the indictment, was an essential ingredient in such conspiracy, and without which part such conspiracy could not exist, is conclusive of the fact that the alleged conspiracy never existed, and the jury must find for the defendants.

FORTY-SEVENTH.

If the jury find that it was agreed early in March, 1879, that there should be a division of all the mail routes, being about one hundred and thirty, and that early in May following, on or about the 5th, such division was in fact made, some of the routes being allotted to Stephen W. Dorsey, others to Miner, and others to Vaile, and that thereupon the said Miner and Vaile entered into copartnership in respect of the routes allotted to them, and the said John W. Dorsey and John M. Peck sold out their respective interests, and that after such division the said Stephen W. Dorsey had no interest in or connection with the routes allotted to Miner and Vaile, and the latter had no interest in or connection with the routes allotted to Stephen W. Dorsey, and that down to such division there had been no such conspiracy as is alleged in the indictment, then, even if it be assumed that the said Stephen W. Dorsey conspired in respect of his routes and the said Miner and Vaile in respect of their routes, thus making two conspiracies, this indictment cannot be maintained, and the jury must find a verdict of not guilty.

FORTY-EIGHTH.

If the evidence in support of the charge of conspiracy in the indictment be as consistent with the theory of two conspiracies entered into after the said division, as mentioned in the next preceding instruction, as with the theory asserted by the prosecution of one conspiracy entered into before the said division, and divided with the mail routes, and then continuing in two parts, or even if the jury entertain a reasonable doubt whether the evidence supports the latter theory as against the former, they must find a verdict of not guilty.

FORTY-NINTH.

And even if the jury shall find that before the division of the routes there was a conspiracy as alleged, but that such conspiracy was at said division abandoned, or ceased to exist, and that after said division two independent conspiracies were formed by the parties representing the routes held by them respectively, then the verdict of the jury must be for acquittal.

FIFTIETH.

The defendants are on trial for conspiracy followed by an overt act, and for no other offense.

Evidence has been given tending to show alterations and erasures in petitions and affidavits, and that some of the latter were sworn to in blank and afterwards filled up, and that statements in them were in some instances erroneous or exaggerated, and that orders were made irregularly. In respect of all such matters, and others involving personal or official misconduct, the jury are instructed that the evidence was admitted solely because of its supposed bearing upon the charge of conspiracy, and that it can be considered by the jury solely with reference to such charge. The issue to be determined is not whether the defendants, or any of them, did wrong things, but whether they conspired as alleged.

The evidence above referred to is to be considered only because of its tendency, if any, to show that the defendants conspired as alleged, and is to receive only that weight to which, in connection with all the facts and circumstances bearing upon the charge of conspiracy, it may in the judgment of the jury be entitled.

FIFTY-FIRST.

A witness professing to be an informer is, on that ground alone, declared by a rule of law unworthy of belief unless corroborated, but such corroboration is of no avail whatever when from the evidence of such witness it is apparent that he has deliberately testified falsely in relation to any material fact. In such case another rule of law places such witness beyond the pale of belief.

FIFTY-SECOND.

The credit to which witnesses are entitled belongs to the exclusive province of the jury.

FIFTY-THIRD.

Even if the jury find that there was a conspiracy, as alleged, prior to the division of the mail contracts, still it is incumbent upon the Government to satisfy the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, that such conspiracy continued after the said division and until within three years before the finding of the indictment, and was afterwards followed by an overt act.

The said division as given in evidence, and if believed by the jury, is inconsistent with the continuance of such conspiracy. The evidence is that John W. Dorsey and John M. Peck sold out their respective interests, and that neither Stephen W. Dorsey, H. M. Vaile, nor John R. Miner was to have in the future any interest in or connection with the contracts allotted to the others.

The common purpose, if there was one, existing before, thus ceased to exist, unless it was agreed or understood at said division that the conspiracy should continue with the difference, only in the manner of holding the contracts and enjoying the alleged illicit gains.

The burthen of proof, however, to show any such agreement or understanding after the division is upon the Government, and it must be established beyond a reasonable doubt. An agreement to execute all necessary papers would not tend to show that the conspiracy was to continue. And the continuance of the alleged conspiracy cannot be inferred from the concurrent acts and conduct of Vaile and Miner and Stephen W. Dorsey, unless the jury shall further find that such concurrent acts and conduct resulted from the agreement or understanding to continue the said conspiracy.

If the conspiracy was not continued as aforesaid, then the jury must find a verdict of not guilty, as, even if Vaile and Miner subsequently conspired as to their contracts and Stephen W. Dorsey as to his contracts, such conspiracies could not be found under this indictment, because that is not the kind of conspiracy charged in the indictment.

FIFTY-FOURTH.

The defendants cannot be convicted under the indictment framed under the act of May 17, 1879, as this one is, unless the indictment charges a conspiracy to commit a fraud which has been defined by some other statute of the United States to be a crime against the United States; and the jury is instructed that by the averments of the said indictment it is not charged that the defendants conspired to commit any fraud which has by any other statute of the United States been defined to be a crime, and the jury must acquit the defendants.

FIFTY-FIFTH.

The defendants cannot be convicted under the indictment framed under said section of the statute, as this one is, unless the indictment charges that the defendants conspired to commit a fraud against the United States which has been by some other statute of the United States defined to be a fraud against the United States; and the jury is instructed that by the averments of the said indictment the defendants are not charged with having conspired to commit any fraud against the United States defined to be such by any other statute, and, therefore, you must acquit the defendants.

FIFTY-SIXTH.

The defendants cannot be convicted under the indictment framed under said section of the statute, as this one is, unless the jury shall find from the evidence that the fraud which they conspired to commit is a fraud defined and made criminal by some other statute of the United States.

FIFTY-SEVENTH.

The indictment in this case charges that these defendants entered into a conspiracy to defraud the United States by means of false petitions, false letters, false affidavits, false applications and statements asking for increase and expedition of service, and by means of false oaths in respect thereof; and by means of the defendant, Brady, making fraudulent orders for increase and expedition of service when such increase and expedition of service was not needed; he, the said Brady, it being alleged, knowing that they were not needed; and by means of the refusal of the said Brady to impose fines and deductions for failure to perform service, and by means of false entries made by William H. Turner on jackets, &c. To make such an indictment a sufficient indictment upon which a verdict of guilty could be rendered against the defendants, or either of them, it must aver and charge not only that the conspiracy was entered into, but it must set forth the means by which the fraud was to be accomplished; and if the means set forth in the indictment are not such as would, if resorted to as charged in the indictment, constitute a fraud against the United States, which at the time of the alleged conspiracy was defined to be a fraud by statute, the indictment would not be sufficient to warrant a verdict against the defendants, and you are instructed that the means set out in this indictment have not been by any statute declared to be a fraud against the United States; if these parties had done each and all of the things set out as means in this indictment they would not have done anything that has been by statute defined to be a fraud against the United States; and hence you are instructed that even though each and every of the means alleged in the indictment had been resorted to by the defendants or any two of them, it would not constitute an offense against the United States; it would not be a fraud defined by any statute; and therefore it is your duty to render a verdict of not guilty.

FIFTY-EIGHTH.

The conspiracy is the offense under the repealed section 5440, as well as under the act of May 17, 1879. Even if you should find that there was a conspiracy entered into prior to the repeal of the section 5440, there could be no conviction in this case for such conspiracy, because the said section having been repealed more than three years prior to the finding of this indictment, no prosecution can be maintained under this indictment for violation of the said section 5440.

FIFTY-NINTH.

Before there can be a conviction in this case the Government must prove that the conspiracy charged was entered into since the 17th day of May, 1879, and within three years prior to the finding of this indictment.

SIXTIETH.

The jury cannot find any of the defendants guilty in this case by finding from the evidence that some part of the alleged offense, as, for example, the conspiracy, was committed prior to the 17th day of May, 1879, and the overt acts in pursuance of the conspiracy were committed since said last-named date. The entire offense must be found by the jury, including the conspiracy and all overt acts, to have been committed since the 17th day of May, 1879, or else they must acquit the defendants.

SIXTY-FIRST.

The jury is also instructed as follows :

1st. Section 5440 of the Revised Statutes was repealed by the act of May 17th, 1879, entitled "An act," &c.

2d. Section 13 Revised Statutes preserves the right to prosecute offenses completed under the said repealed section 5440, before it was repealed.

3d. No offense committed under that repealed section could be prosecuted by indictment found more than three years after the said repeal, to wit, more than three years after May 17, 1879.

4th. This section 5440 of the Revised Statutes was repealed more than three years before the finding of this indictment, and hence this charge is prosecuted under the act of May 17th, 1879; and if the indictment is not for an offense committed after said act was passed, it cannot be maintained. In other words, if the conspiracy which is sought to be prosecuted by this indictment was entered into before the section 5440 was repealed, this prosecution must fail, and you must acquit.

5th. To sustain the charge in this indictment the Government must find from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the conspiracy complained of was formed since the 17th of May, 1879, and within three years before the finding of the indictment.

SIXTY-SECOND.

The jury are charged that none of the orders set forth and complained of in the indictment and charged therein to have been made by defendant Brady while acting as Second Assistant Postmaster-General are in said indictment alleged to have been made to effect the object of the alleged conspiracy in said indictment charged, and the jury will not consider either of said orders as overt acts or acts mentioned and described in the statute of May 17, 1879, as done to effect the object of a conspiracy. And neither of said orders can be considered by the jury as overt acts in this case done to effect the object of said conspiracy in the indictment charged, and you must exclude from consideration each and all of said orders as overt acts.

The overt acts attempted to be charged in the indictment from and including that beginning on page 74, to and including the one ending middle of page 80, cannot be considered by you as overt acts, because the prosecution of said claims respectively is not charged to have been to effect the object of the conspiracy, and you must exclude them from your consideration as overt acts. And you will for like reason exclude as overt acts those attempted to be charged beginning at the middle of page 81, and ending near the top of page 87.

And you will for like reason reject as overt acts the last two overt acts attempted to be charged in said indictment.

SIXTY-THIRD.

The jury are further instructed to disregard as overt acts each and every of the overt acts attempted to be charged as such beginning on page 73, of the indictment in relation to the presentation of false claims and ending with the indictment, because the same do not nor does either of them contain sufficient averments to entitle them to be considered as overt acts; it is not averred therein wherein they were false and fraudulent as charged.

SIXTY-FOURTH.

The jury are instructed that the alleged overt acts in relation to the presentation of false claims, beginning on page 73 of the indictment and ending with said indictment on page 89, must be disregarded as overt acts, because no evidence has been offered of the presentation of any claim to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, either by the parties charged to have presented such claims or by any parties, nor for the amounts named, nor for any amounts.

The jury are instructed to disregard as overt acts each thereof in relation to the presentation of false claims, to which the evidence fails to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the presentation thereof, to the said Auditor by the identical persons named in the indictment as having presented them, and for the exact amounts named. But no such proof has been offered, and hence you must exclude these entirely from your consideration.

SIXTY-FIFTH.

The jury are instructed that the introduction of warrants upon which payments were made on account of the contracts named in the indictment will not suffice to prove that the parties who are alleged in the overt acts relating to the presentation of false claims, beginning on page 73 and concluding with said indictment on page 89, to have presented the claims did present such claims, and there being no evidence that they did present the claims described in the indictment you must exclude these from your consideration altogether as overt acts.

SIXTY-SIXTH.

The court charges the jury that it is alleged in the indictment in this case that certain defendants named at one time presented to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department a certain alleged false and fraudulent claim against the Post-Office Department of the Government of the United States of America, for approval by said Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, and for payment by the Postmaster-General of the United States of America, of a certain specific sum of money; and that it is also alleged in the indictment that certain other defendants named, at a certain other time, so presented, as aforesaid, for audit and payment a claim for certain other and different sums of money, and that said acts were done to effect the object of the conspiracy described in the indictment. The jury are therefore charged that no such act can be considered by them as an act done to effect the object of said conspiracy, unless the testimony establishes that the particular persons charged in said indictment to have presented said particular claims for audit and payment, as aforesaid, did actually present as charged; and it is not sufficient to establish that part of the charge that different defendants from those named in the indictment did present said claims charged in the indictment to have been presented by others.

SIXTY-SEVENTH.

Whether there was or was not such a conspiracy as is charged in the indictment formed and entered into by the defendants at the time charged in the indictment is a question of fact exclusively submitted to the jury to determine; and this they must do on their own independent judgment. And in determining the existence and extent of said conspiracy and the guilty connection of any defendant therewith the jury considers and weighs against any one defendant only such circumstances, facts, and declarations as spring from his own conduct. No defendant by his acts or declarations can affect another defendant not present at the time of such act or declaration unless first authorized by that other to do such act or make such declaration while discharging or performing some business connected with the subject-matter complained of in the indictment.

SIXTY-EIGHTH.

One defendant cannot be proved to be engaged in a conspiracy by the acts or declarations of others. No defendant can be found guilty of being in a conspiracy by any entries that one defendant may have made or caused to be made in his books in relation to or affecting another defendant without the knowledge of the latter. Even if you should believe that there were such books of S. W. Dorsey as is claimed by the prosecution, and even if you believe that there were such entries therein as is claimed by the prosecution, such entries cannot be considered by you as proving or tending to prove that the defendant, Brady, was in the alleged conspiracy.

SIXTY-NINTH.

In respect of the question of the existence of a conspiracy, the court charges the jury that no defendant can be proved to be in a conspiracy by the acts or declarations of any person other than himself. His own acts and declarations are all that can be considered as against him in respect of proving conspiracy as against him, and unless from his acts and declarations you can find beyond a reasonable doubt that he was in a conspiracy, you cannot find a verdict against him.

SEVENTIETH.

The acts done or declarations made about or concerning defendant Brady by any of the other defendants, not done or made in the presence of said Brady, are not admissible against said Brady to prove either the conspiracy as to him or the alleged corrupt character of the orders made by him and complained of in the indictment. The guilt of defendant Brady of the charge in the indictment made against him must be proved, if at all, by facts, acts, and circumstances springing from his own conduct alone.

SEVENTY-FIRST.

It is alleged in the indictment, among other things, that it was intended by the defendants, as a part of the alleged conspiracy in said indictment charged against defendants, to deceive the Postmaster-General in respect of the matters complained of in the indictment. The court therefore charges the jury that unless the allegations in the indictment relating to the deception of the Postmaster-General have been established as therein alleged, there can be no conviction under the evidence in this case.

SEVENTY-SECOND.

If the jury believe from the evidence in this case that in transacting all the official business mentioned in the indictment defendant Brady advised and consulted with the Postmaster-General in good faith, and without deceiving him in respect thereof, and made the respective orders for the allowance of money to the defendants complained of in the indictment as the result of such consultation and advice with said Postmaster-General, and pursuant to such advice, or because he, said Brady, believed at the time the said respective orders were made that it was right and proper to make them, then the jury must acquit said Brady, though they do not approve in their own minds the making of said orders.

SEVENTY-THIRD.

The court charges the jury that there can be in this case no conspiracy to defraud the United States concerning the matters complained of in the indictment in manner condemned by the act of May 17, 1879, which does not include as a part of said conspiracy an agreement among the parties thereto to deceive the Postmaster-General in respect to the payments to defendants, or some of them, of the amounts of money, or some of them, shown in the evidence to have been paid as alleged in the indictment; and the allegations of the indictment in respect of such deception must be proved as alleged, or there can be no connection in this case.

SEVENTY-FOURTH.

The jury are instructed that in this indictment the defendants are not charged with having conspired to defraud the United States by deceiving by means of petitions and affidavits the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, but the charge is that the defendants conspired to defraud the United States by means of affidavits and petitions, &c., recorded and filed for the purpose of deceiving the Postmaster-General; and under this indictment the defendants cannot be convicted of having conspired to defraud the United States by deceiving the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

SEVENTY-FIFTH.

If the jury believe from the evidence in this case that the Postmaster-General acting as such at the time the transactions complained of in the indictment happened and were done was not deceived in respect thereof, but, on the contrary, knew about and approved all the orders for allowance of money to defendants, or any of them, made by defendant Brady, then they must acquit defendant Brady.

SEVENTY-SIXTH.

The jury are instructed and charged that the original contracts mentioned in the indictment for conveying the mail on and over the respective routes named in said indictment are not therein alleged to have been fraudulently entered into or made, and for the purposes of this case they and each of them must be assumed to have been honestly and orderly executed.

SEVENTY-SEVENTH.

The court charges the jury that defendant Brady is not shown by the testimony in this case to have been a party to any of the contracts or subcontracts read in evidence, under and by means of which the business described in this case was in whole or in part transacted; and any acts done, or declarations made, by any of the defendants other than defendant Brady, not in Brady's presence or with his knowledge or connivance, about the said business during the period of the alleged conspiracy cannot affect defendant Brady either as evidence of a conspiracy as to him or as proof of any act of defendant Brady alleged in the indictment to have been done to effect the object of said alleged conspiracy.

SEVENTY-EIGHTH.

The court charges the jury that it is not sufficient to authorize a connection in this case of any of the defendants to show by the evidence that two or more of the defendants, exclusive of defendant Brady, entered into a copartnership, or business agreement, or understanding among themselves, to carry out and perform the contracts read in evidence and described in the indictment for carrying the United States mails on and over the routes, or some of them, mentioned in the indictment, and also agreed, in addition thereto, to procure an increase of pay for more frequent and quicker mail service over said routes, or some of them, up to the limit of payment therefor allowed by law to be ordered to be paid.

SEVENTY-NINTH.

The court charges the jury that none of the acts set forth and described in the indictment and alleged therein to have been done by some of the defendants to effect the object of the alleged conspiracy are shown by the allegations of the indictment to be of such a nature as to be calculated to effect the object of said alleged conspiracy to defraud the United States. (King vs. Rex, 79 B., 782; 7 Barb., 391; United States vs. Crafton, 4 Dillon.)

EIGHTIETH.

The jury are instructed that whether or not the increase of mail service, the payment for which is complained of in the indictment, was or was not necessary for the public good, or was lawfully needed or required, or was for the advantage of the United States, were questions of fact exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Post-Office Department, and with the decision of which the jury have nothing to do, and the jury cannot consider or decide either of those questions of fact in this case. (Sedg. on Stat. & Con. Law, 156-163; Cooley, 4 ed., 87; 13 Wall., 384; Atty. Gen. vs. Brown, 1 Miss.—, 522; Brown vs. Porter, 9 How., 235; W. S. Retchel, 17 How., 533, 534; W. S. Ferry, 13 How., 40-48; 1 Bish. Com. Law, 462; 4 Black. Com., 121.)

EIGHTY-FIRST.

The jury are charged that section 3965 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which reads as follows, "The Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post routes established by law, as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper," invests said Postmaster-General as the head of the Post-Office Department with discretionary power to fix the frequency of trips and the rate of speed which shall govern in carrying the United States mails, under contracts made by him therefor, over said routes; that what is due regard for productiveness is not defined by the laws of the United States, and is therefore a question submitted by the law itself to the judgment and decision of the Postmaster-General, from whose interpretation of said law there is no appeal, and the jury in this case are not authorized to substitute their interpretation of said law for that of the Postmaster-General.

EIGHTY-SECOND.

Nor can any conviction in this case be based, either in whole or in part, upon any finding by the jury that the increase or expedition of service shown in this case by the evidence was, in the judgment or opinion of the jury, extravagant, or needless, or unwise, or not made with due regard to productiveness. Neither the court nor the jury can retry or sit in judgment upon or in any way take jurisdiction of said matters of discretion submitted by the statute to the discretion and judgment of the Postmaster-General.

EIGHTY-THIRD.

That in making up their verdict in this case the jury must assume that every act and order done and made by the Postmaster-General, or by his assistant, Brady, or by the two jointly, and which acts and orders are by law submitted to the discretion of these officers as to the propriety or utility of adopting them, must be by the jury assumed to have been properly, honestly, and wisely made and ordered, and to have been done with due regard to productiveness and other circumstances.

EIGHTY-FOURTH.

In determining the guilt or innocence of defendant Brady, the jury will not consider or weigh any of the official acts done and performed by him in the discharge of his official duties as Second Assistant Postmaster-General. (State vs. Gov., 39 Mo., 388-99.)

EIGHTY-FIFTH.

Though the jury may believe from the evidence in this case that defendant Brady ordered to be paid to some or all of the defendants more money for services claimed by said defendants to have been performed by them for carrying the mail over the routes, or some of them, mentioned in the indictment, than under the provisions of the law governing the payment for such services ought to have been paid or ordered by him to have been paid, yet such payment or order of payment is not declared by law to be a fraud upon the United States, and defendant Brady cannot be convicted therefor under this indictment.

EIGHTY-SIXTH.

If the jury believe from the evidence in this case that any of the increase of mail service ordered by defendant Brady, and complained of in the indictment, was brought about and procured to be ordered by persons other than the defendants, and not under the control of defendants, or either of them, then to the extent that such was the case there is a failure of proof of the allegations of the indictment charging said orders to have been brought about and procured by a conspiracy between other of the defendants and said Brady, and in making up their verdict the jury will not consider the orders so procured to be made by others.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH.

The court charges the jury that there is no presumption of law against the truthfulness of the testimony of any of the defendants in this case springing out of the fact that they are defendants, but the testimony of the defendants is to receive such weight as in the judgment of the jury it is entitled to.

EIGHTY-EIGHTH.

The court instructs the jury that it is charged in said indictment that the said defendants at a certain date filed, or caused to be filed, in the Post-Office Department—

1. False petition on route 34149.
2. False oath on route 34149.
3. False oath on route 35015.
4. False petitions on route 35015.

5. False petitions on route 35051.
6. False petitions on route 38134.
7. False oath on route 38134.
8. False oath on route 38135.
9. False petitions on route 38135.
10. False petitions on route 38140.
11. False oath on route 38140.
12. False oath on route 38156.
13. Fraudulent subcontract on route 40104.
14. False oath on route 40104.
15. False oath on route 40113.
16. False petitions on route 40113.
17. False oath on route 46132.
18. False petitions on route 46247.
19. False petitions on route 44160.

Now, unless the jury believe, from the evidence, that said oaths, petitions and subcontract were filed on the dates charged in the said indictment, they will disregard each and all as overt acts. And in making up their verdict, the jury cannot take the filing of the aforesaid petitions, oaths, and subcontract into consideration as overt acts.

EIGHTY-NINTH.

The jury are further instructed that in the said indictment it is alleged that the said defendants filed on the 27th day of June, 1879, a certain forged petition on route 44155. Now if the jury believe from the evidence that said petition was filed on the 23d day of April, 1879, then they are instructed that they cannot consider such overt act in making up their verdict.

NINETIETH.

The jury are also instructed that it is charged in said indictment that the said defendants filed a forged petition on route 44160, on the 16th day of July, 1880. Now, if the jury believe, from the evidence, that such petition was filed on the 7th day of May, 1879, then the jury have no right to take into consideration said allegation as an overt act, in making up their verdict.

NINETY-FIRST.

The jury are further instructed that in making up their verdict they cannot take into consideration as overt acts the following, to wit:

1. Filing subcontract by S. W. Dorsey, on route 38113.
2. Filing subcontract by S. W. Dorsey, on route 38135.
3. Filing subcontract by S. W. Dorsey, on route 38140.
4. Filing subcontract by J. L. Sanderson, on route 38150.
5. Filing subcontract by S. W. Dorsey, on route 38156.
6. Filing subcontract by M. C. Rerdell, on route 40104.
7. Filing subcontract by H. M. Vaile, on route 46132.

For these reasons, namely:

- (1) The allegation is not properly pleaded. It is not sufficient to say that they fraudulently sent a paper.
- (2) It is impossible to fraudulently file a subcontract; and
- (3) Because of variance in regard to date of filing subcontracts on routes 38150 and 40104, they having been filed before the 23d day of May, 1879.

NINETY-SECOND.

The jury are further instructed that they cannot take into consideration as overt acts, in making up their verdict, the following orders charged to have been made by Thomas J. Brady, to wit:

1. The order of March 8, 1881 (p. 28).
2. The order of July 10, 1879 (p. 32).
3. The order of July 10, 1879 (p. 34).
4. The order of August 2, 1879 (p. 36).
5. The order of July 8, 1879 (p. 38).
6. The order of June 26, 1879 (p. 41).
7. The order of November 10, 1880 (p. 42).
8. The order of December 14, 1880 (p. 43).
9. The order of May 23, 1880 (p. 45).
10. The order of February 26, 1880 (p. 47).
11. The order of July 12, 1879 (p. 52).
12. The order of December 28, 1880 (p. 53).
13. The order of July 23, 1879 (p. 55).
14. The order of April 10, 1880 (p. 56).
15. The order of June 3, 1879 (p. 58).
16. The order of January 4, 1881 (p. 59).
17. The order of February 11, 1881 (p. 60).
18. The order of April 17, 1880 (p. 62).
19. The order of July 16, 1880 (p. 64).
20. The order of June 24, 1879 (p. 66).
21. The order of February 11, 1881 (p. 67).
22. The order of June 26, 1879 (p. 70).
23. The order of July 8, 1879 (p. 72).

NOTE: The reasons: Because not charged to have been done in pursuance of the conspiracy, or to effect the object thereof—

—The Government having failed to prove that they were ever certified to the Auditor.—

NINETY-THIRD.

The jury are further instructed that in making up their verdict they will not regard as an overt act the charge on page 69 of the indictment, of sending the oath on route 44140 to the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, for the reason that it is not charged that said oath was sent in pursuance of the conspiracy, or to effect the object thereof.

NINETY-FOURTH.

And further, That they will not consider the charge, on page 72, of filing false petitions on route 41119 as an overt act, for the same reason.

NINETY-FIFTH.

The jury are further instructed that they will not take into consideration as an overt act, in making up their verdict, the charge, on page 35, of filing false petitions on route 35051, for the same reason.

NINETY-SIXTH.

The jury are further instructed that they cannot take into consideration the overt act set out on page 48 in the indictment in relation to route 38150—the same being an order made by Thomas J. Brady—if they believe from the evidence that said route was subcontracted to J. L.

Sanderson at full rates, from the 1st day of July, 1878; and in no event can the jury consider the same as an overt act unless they believe that the said order was made in pursuance of a corrupt conspiracy between the defendants as set out in this indictment; and if they believe, from the evidence, that the said order was made for the benefit of J. L. Sanderson, and that he received the one month's extra pay, then the jury cannot consider the same in this case, in making up their verdict.

NINETY-SEVENTH.

The jury are further instructed that they cannot consider the overt act charged upon route 38152, on p. 50—the same being an order of Thomas J. Brady to discontinue service and allow the contractor one month's extra pay—if the jury believe from the evidence, that at the time said order was made, J. L. Sanderson was the subcontractor at full rates.

NINETY-EIGHTH.

The court instructs the jury that as to the charge of the overt act on page 71 of the indictment—fraudulently sending and causing to be placed in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General the oath on route 41119—the jury must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that John M. Peck, John R. Miner, Harvey M. Vaile, Stephen W. Dorsey, and Montfort C. Rerdell did fraudulently send, transmit, and deliver, and cause and procure to be placed in the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, among the papers relating and pertaining to the said post-route numbered 41119, a certain unlawful, false, willful, and corrupt oath, deposition, and statement, as set forth on page 71 of the indictment; and if the jury believe from the evidence, that at the time the said affidavit was filed, John R. Miner, Harvey M. Vaile, and John M. Peck, had no interest in the said route, and that the said John R. Miner and Harvey M. Vaile did not fraudulently send, transmit, and deliver, or cause or procure to be placed in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General the said oath—then the court instructs the jury that they cannot consider the filing of the said oath, or placing it in the Post Office Department, as an overt act.

NINETY-NINTH.

The jury are instructed that they are the exclusive judges of the weight that is to be given to the evidence of each witness. The jury have the right to take into consideration the circumstances under which each witness testifies, the motive that each witness has, his appearance upon the stand, and if the jury believe that Rerdell, or Moore, or any other witness, knowingly swore falsely in any material point, the jury have the right to disregard the entire testimony of such witness.

ONE HUNDREDTH.

The court instructs the jury that the defendants are on trial for the conspiracy charged in the indictment, and for no other offense; and that the indictment does not charge that the defendants, or any of them, conspired to defraud the United States by deceiving the Second Assistant Postmaster-General; but the charge is, that the defendants, including the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, conspired to defraud the United States by deceiving, through certain means, the Postmaster-General; and under this indictment no two of the defendants can be convicted of having conspired to defraud the United States by deceiving the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

MONDAY, JUNE 11, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

The COURT. Gentlemen, this day was assigned for the argument of the prayers; are you prepared?

Mr. BLISS. Has your honor any directions as to the order of procedure?

The COURT. I do not think that I have any special directions. I suppose that the Government opens upon its own prayers.

Mr. MERRICK. We open upon all of them.

Mr. BLISS. It was as to that point that I wanted to inquire. There are certain of the prayers on both sides that overlap on the same ground of discussion.

The COURT. Yes; that is necessarily so.

Mr. BLISS. It was as to that point that I desired the direction of the court: As to whether the Government should open upon the whole or what should be the course of procedure.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I suppose the Government will open upon its own prayers.

The COURT. The prayers may be likened to the pleadings in a cause. The Government will open its argument upon all the prayers on both sides.

Mr. HENKLE. Would it not be better, your honor, to take up each prayer seriatim and have the court pass upon it?

The COURT. The court is not going to announce its decision upon each prayer as it goes along.

Mr. HENKLE. That is quite customary in settling prayers.

The COURT. How can the court announce its decision in the absence of the jury? These are instructions to the jury. I am to hear you upon the prayers. It is not important, it seems to me whether the Government shall open merely upon its own prayers and reply upon its own prayers and then the other side open upon their prayers and reply upon their prayers, or——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] Let me suggest a mode of procedure. The Government will open upon the prayers the prosecution may desire. Then let us open on our prayers, for this reason: There are many of the prayers that we do not wish to argue, but which are offered simply for the purpose of saving the point. Several of them your honor has decided, and decided so often that we would not care to argue them again. Consequently if we open as to our prayers we will select such as we really wish to argue, and then the Government can answer those prayers. I make the suggestion simply to save a vast deal of time.

The COURT. Gentlemen, that suggestion commends itself to me. You will, if you please, proceed with the argument upon the prayers for the prosecution in the first place.

Mr. KER. Your honor's ruling in this matter will simplify matters very much. On the part of the prosecution we do not intend to take up each prayer by itself, because the majority of them your honor has already passed upon, and they have been elaborately argued during the trial of the case. The principal proposition that we wish to bring to your honor's mind is contained in the fifteenth and sixteenth prayers, and to those, taken in connection with the nineteenth and twentieth, being almost analogous, I will devote my attention entirely, exclusive of all the rest.

I hope I may make myself clear in expressing to your honor the principle which we want to bring to your honor's attention in this case. I will read first this prayer :

FIFTEENTH.

When a defendant in a criminal cause becomes a witness on his own behalf, and has been notified to produce books and papers admitted by him or shown to have been in his possession, and which, if produced, would have been competent evidence in the cause, and upon cross-examination such defendant witness reiterates his refusal to produce such books and papers, the jury is entitled to presume that such books and papers, if produced, would have disclosed evidence disadvantageous to such defendant, and that such failure casts suspicion on all the other evidence adduced by said defendant, and is a circumstance tending to prove his guilt.

The next is :

SIXTEENTH.

In searching through the different reports to find cases that are decided covering this portion of our law that permits a defendant to become a witness on his own behalf, I find that there are very few decisions bearing directly upon the point in issue. As I said before, I want to try to bring it so plainly before your honor that your honor will understand the point that we are making. It is this :

First, not that having been given notice to produce the books, and failing to do so, then the inference is to be drawn against him, but that being a part of the proceedings of the case before your honor and within your honor's knowledge, and upon which your honor had to pass before we could pass by the threshold of that point and enter the door of secondary evidence, your honor therefore knew that the notice had been given, and the defendants knew it ; but when we come to that part of the case where the defendant himself takes the witness stand, where he becomes a witness, and where he seeks in his testimony to deny the testimony that has been given on the part of the Government, then there is a new phase of the case opened, and it becomes an important matter to consider what are the rights, the duties, and the obligations of the defendant when he takes the witness-stand in his own behalf.

Suppose we had given no evidence whatever of the contents of the papers, the books, and the stubs that have been under discussion. Suppose they had not entered into the calculation at all. Suppose the defendant took the witness-stand on his own behalf and was asked upon the cross-examination, "Did you not make an entry on the stub of your check-books?" "I don't remember that I did." "Have you such a check-book or such a stub?" "I presume I have. I ordered my clerk to examine, and he made an examination." "Did you find there a peculiar check, for instance, one to J. B. B.?" "I don't know whether I did or not." "Will you produce the stub of that check-book, and let us see?" "No; no." The answer is made by himself, and the answer is made by his counsel. Now, if the question were a proper one, and admitted by the court, is it not, then, a proper question upon cross-examination, and if it is a proper question, going to his credibility and going towards searching out evidence which he is required to produce when he takes the stand upon cross-examination, what position, then, does the witness occupy? Suppose he were asked in his cross-examination, "Did you not pay money to Thomas J. Brady," and he should reply, "I decline to answer," what would your honor then do with the witness? How could we compel that witness to answer that very material question? Cross-examination is one of the material parts of the case. It is the test that is applied to the witness's statements to ascertain whether he is telling the truth or whether he is telling a falsehood. Cross-examination is of great importance in a case. If a party had been examined in chief upon a material point, and during the adjournment of the court, and before the opposite side had an opportunity to cross-examine that witness, the witness should die, what would become of that witness's testimony? Would it stand for so much as had been given, or would it be excluded entirely? I think I am right when I say that that testimony would be excluded entirely. Not being given in full and the right to cross-examine not having been exercised, the testimony passes for nothing. Is a witness taking the stand in his own behalf in any better shape than an ordinary witness? Suppose there had been a witness brought here to testify on behalf of the defendants, and that witness, after taking the stand and being interrogated in chief, were to be cross-examined as follows: "Did you write a letter?" "Probably I did." "Did you not get that letter in your possession?" "I think I did." "Have you that letter?" "Yes; I have it." "Will you give it to us?" "No." What would your honor do in that case? Would your honor compel him? Would your honor commit him for contempt? In case he failed to produce the paper, what then? Might we not say to your honor as to that portion of the witness's testimony in which that paper became a material and necessary part of the case that we would ask your honor to exclude it and to have that portion of the testimony wiped out and withdrawn entirely from the consideration of the jury? When a witness states a matter the truth of which is known only to himself and will not verify it by the highest kind of evidence which he is capable of producing, how are we to reach that evidence? We have no means of testing whether the witness is telling the truth or not. In all probability your honor would commit that witness if he refused to produce the evidence that your honor directed him to produce and he would remain in prison. It might be a hardship on the part of the person who called the witness to have his testimony excluded but that is a matter over which neither the plaintiff nor the defendant has any control. We only seek to get the best light we can in the administration of justice. It is a part and parcel and portion of the administration of justice, and when a witness, a third party, is brought in, voluntarily or involuntarily, without any interest in the case, there is only one point upon which he can claim privilege outside of professional privilege, and that is that his testimony might criminate himself; then, under your honor's instruction, we would not be permitted to go to the length of asking him about that. But again the question here arises, would you not, as to that material point, strike out the testimony and not allow one-half of it to go to the jury and the other half to be concealed in the breast of the witness?

When a defendant takes the stand, I submit to your honor that he occupies an entirely different position from the voluntary or involuntary third party witness. Under the law we could not ask him to take the stand. Under the law your honor could not force from him a book that he held in his hand, and defied us to produce or cause to be produced. When he takes the witness-stand and divests himself of the privilege that is thrown about him, and is sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, as to everything that is material to the issue before the court, he is bound to answer. The question can be put to him plainly and openly, "Did you pay money to Thomas J. Brady?" and he is under oath bound to answer that question. Your honor would decide that he is bound to answer it, and that its criminating influence would have nothing to do with him, nor would the question whether its effect might be good, bad, or indifferent. He has put himself in such a position that he must answer the question. Suppose he refuses, would your honor commit him for contempt? Suppose it were a case of murder where he was on trial for his life and he took the witness-stand and refused to disclose a matter that was inquired about on cross-examination. Would your honor then say, "I will commit you to prison and I will keep you there until you do answer? I will tie this jury together and let them wander around. The trial must stop. We will not go on any further. We will wait until you answer that question." It seems to me that it does not require much argument or much ingenuity to make it evident that a man might in such a way very readily escape with his life and suffer only a little temporary confinement under a commitment for contempt of court. Now, if a rule is good in one case it is good in all. If a rule will apply to murder or manslaughter or the higher crimes of felony it will apply equally well to the lower grades of misdemeanor. You cannot make a rule for one class of cases and another rule for another class of cases. You will have to make your rule answer for both. When a witness says, "I decline to answer; I will not produce these papers; I will not produce the stub that will show whether I am telling the truth or a falsehood; that will show whether, when I denied conversations with Government witnesses, I was telling the truth or a falsehood," and when he keeps them in his possession we ask your honor now for the first time, as far as we have been able with diligent research to discover through all the authorities, to establish a precedent upon this very important matter in criminal law. Almost every State has passed a law similar to this; but in no instance has a defendant ever boldly and defiantly said in the face of the ruling of the court, "I will not do it." Your honor is now called upon to decide that point. Knowing as we knew the importance of the point, and believing that we were correct in principle at the time the request was made and the witness refused to produce the books and to give us the information that we asked and desired, we waited until this opportunity would arise to discuss the law before your honor, and to ask your honor to so instruct the jury. We have collected together a number of cases, civil and criminal.

The COURT. You are on the sixteenth prayer now.

Mr. KER. I am referring to the prayer in the printed report on pages 5777 and 5778.

Mr. BLISS. He is discussing two together.

The COURT. The fifteenth and sixteenth.

Mr. MERRICK. They are substantially the same. One is supplemental to the other. As I wrote them they were intended so to be. There were some authorities attached to the original copy, but they are not printed in the record.

The COURT. I see them.

Mr. KER. There have been a series of decisions of England that have been followed in the courts of the United States in regard to a witness brought upon the stand and refusing to answer questions, and more especially that portion of the privilege of the witness where he is not bound to answer a question that would criminate himself. When a witness takes that stand and says, "I cannot or will not answer because it may criminate myself," then the question would arise, what is to be done with the testimony of the witness. In the case of Dickson against Vaile, found in Carrington and Paine's reports—and I will give your honor a list of these authorities——

The COURT. [Interposing.] Is it not well established that when a defendant comes upon the stand as a witness he is there as a witness only, and has the privileges of a witness, and no more?

Mr. MERRICK. The authorities go a little further and say that he is in some respects not entirely in the same attitude; that he is worse off than an ordinary witness.

The COURT. I know.

Mr. INGERSOLL. As to the particular crime charged.

The COURT. As to the particular crime charged he is there as witness.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Certainly.

The COURT. And if another witness would be bound to answer the questions put to him in regard to the particular charge, he is equally bound to do the same.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is all there is to it.

Mr. MERRICK. The question behind that is the manner with which to deal with the testimony.

The COURT. The question is how the court will deal with the evidence. We have nothing to do with the witness as a defendant when he appears upon the witness-stand as a witness. As a defendant he is out of the case. He is testifying in relation to himself as a defendant, and he testifies precisely as any other witness would. He cannot defend himself as a witness under his privileges as a defendant.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir.

The COURT. I think there is no question about that proposition. The other side do not seem to question it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He is just like any other witness.

Mr. KER. The only question in my mind is whether it is worth while for me to go on with that branch of the subject. I think your honor is sufficiently familiar with it without my saying anything more, unless your honor should consider it necessary to ask for the authorities. The principle is very plain as to what is to be done with the testimony of a witness who refuses to answer on the ground of criminating himself, having already given a portion of his testimony. Decisions in the English courts have been to strike out that portion, and that ruling has been followed in the American courts, particularly in Vermont and in Massachusetts, to the extent that that portion of the testimony being incomplete for want of full and sufficient and clear answer, although it may be damaging to the side of the person who has called the witness, cannot be considered; that the court cannot give half of the testimony to the jury while the other half is hidden in the breast of the witness. That is only one of the analogies. It is not one of the facts and circumstances that arise in this case. The next is, when he takes the witness-stand and refuses to produce the books when on cross examination and asked in reference to them, how does he stand?

The COURT. I understand you are discussing the fifteenth prayer.

Mr. KER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLISS. The fifteenth and sixteenth prayers are being discussed together, your honor.

The COURT. Let us see what the proposition in the fifteenth is first.

Mr. KER. It is in the nature of a refusal to answer a question. It is of the same important significance as if he had said, "I will not answer." If he admits that he has the book in his possession, that would speak in such a way that there could be no doubt about it; there could be no hesitation on the part of the prosecution or on the part of the defense. It is of stronger importance and significance than if he had said, "I will not answer, because I might criminate myself," or, "I will not answer, because I will not." He had the books, and that is what we complain of.

The COURT. Are you arguing this proposition now that from their bare refusal to produce the books you have a right to infer guilt?

Mr. KER. Precisely, on cross-examination. We make a distinction where in chief, or where we are examining the witness on giving notice, then secondary evidence can come in, and that stops. We are not complaining of that. When the party takes the witness-stand himself, then whatever privilege he held as a defendant is waived. If he had said when we first notified him, "I will not give up the books and papers," our remedy was simply we could have proved the contents.

The COURT. They announced that to you; they told you they were not going to help you make out your case.

Mr. KER. Then we could give secondary evidence, and we gave it.

The COURT. Yes; you gave it. Then how did you come to interrogate him on the cross-examination about that?

Mr. KER. Your honor ruled that they could not then produce the books in order to contradict the secondary evidence. That is right; that is the law. But we were anxious to have the whole case, and Mr. Merrick on cross-examination waived all that, and said, "Will you produce them?" His counsel said, "No; not if they only contained some poetry about spring." We waived all that, and then the case took this shape: That if he had not gone on the stand, then the secondary evidence would have remained good and unimpeached; there would have been no trouble about it. But he took the witness-stand himself, and then he threw away every privilege that belonged to him as a defendant.

The COURT. What did he say in his evidence in chief in regard to the books?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not a word.

Mr. KER. He was not asked that.

Mr. MERRICK. He denied, in his evidence in chief, that there were certain things on the books.

The COURT. I know; but he did not deny the existence of the books.

Mr. MERRICK. He said he had the books.

Mr. KER. He testified in this way: His counsel would say that Rerdell testified on page so and so, would read the testimony to him, and ask him, "Did you tell him that?" "No, sir." "Did you tell him to make an entry on the stub-book to William Smith?" "No, sir." "Did you tell him that there was a check to J. B. B.?" "No, sir." He said he did not tell him anything of that, and denied it all. But when Mr. Merrick came to the cross-examination, he says: "Did not you tell Rerdell to write on the stub of that check-book William Smith?" "I don't think I did." "Will you produce that stub?" Counsel says, "No, we will not." Now, does your honor see the difference? Could there be any dispute about the difference in position which the defendant occupied as a witness and as a defendant, when he threw down the mantle of secrecy and silence which we claim he did when he went on the stand. To verify his denial we asked him to produce the books that would have contradicted Rerdell, if they would have done that, and would have sustained Dorsey, if they had done so. But he declined to do it. We contend that he stands in the same position as if he had said, "I will not answer." One is the written answer, the other is the verbal; and the written answer is higher than the verbal, because it is of such a nature that it could not be clipped and altered to fit the occasion.

Your honor is not bound by our prayers. Your honor is bound to tell the jury what the law is, regardless of the prayers from either side. We ask these simply to direct your honor's attention to the points we make, and we draw them mildly in order that your honor may draw the law mildly or go beyond what we ask. We do not ask your honor to strike out that testimony, although I believe we could ask you to do so, and your honor would be justified in doing that. I mean that portion of the testimony that relates to the denial of the order to put William Smith upon the stub of the check-book or in the books that were made by Rerdell and that were copied by Gibbs and by Donnelly and traced into Dorsey's possession. The whole of those enter into the same category, together with the letter of December 9, 1878, written to John W. Dorsey.

His counsel ingeniously takes the position that we cannot notify them to produce secondary evidence. We will admit that as far as that goes and deny it at the other extremity. Secondary evidence cannot be called for in order to give the contents of secondary evidence; but when the defendant takes the stand and is asked, "Have you not in your possession a letter-book containing copies of letters that were sent to different people, and particularly one of December 9, 1878?" and he admits that he has that letter-book, and it appears that the witness obtained his information from that letter-book, I maintain again, your honor, that that is evidence the same as the stub of the check. When the witness speaks of the letter-book he does not speak of the letter that went to Bosler, but he speaks of that which his eyes rested upon in the possession of the defendant. But the press-copy of the letter was indexed in a letter-press copy-book. Rerdell says, "I saw that letter-press copy." Dorsey is asked on the stand, "Haven't you that copy? We ask you to produce it." And we are met by the same refusal, "We will not do it." I maintain, your honor, that there is no possible shape of secondary evidence in that case.

As I said, we do not ask your honor to strike out the testimony. I do not know what your honor may do, but we do not go that far. It is the first time that branch of the case has been reached, and it ought to be decided with a great deal of care. We hesitated about asking your honor to go that far. I do not know but probably the gentleman who closes on the part of the prosecution may ask your honor to go that far.

Mr. WILSON. We would like to know now.

Mr. KER. In my own mind I feel very clear, but I feel diffident and timid about asking your honor to take that step. But I have no hesitation at all now in asking your honor to do what we do ask, and that is, to instruct the jury in accordance with this prayer—that his failure to produce those books, those stubs, those checks, upon cross-examination, to substantiate his statement made in his examination-in-chief, would, if produced—have disclosed evidence disadvantageous to such defendant, and that such failure casts suspicion on all the other evidence adduced by said defendant, and is a circumstance tending to prove his guilt.

Like any other concealment, like anything else that he does that shows a desire to evade telling the truth and display fully his entire case before the jury.

The State vs. Ober, 52 N. H., 459. This case was decided in 1873. Ober was indicted for keeping spirituous liquors for sale. On examination he was asked if he had not sold spirituous liquors within one year previous to the finding of the indictment. He declined to answer, as it might tend to criminate him. Counsel for the State argued that Ober's declining to answer made it a pertinent matter of evidence to be taken against him. Ober's counsel objected.

The COURT. That is a new authority that is not here on the list.

Mr. KER. Ober's counsel objected to the question. The court overruled the objection, and in the charge to the jury expressly instructed them that they might consider that declination to answer and give it such weight as they thought it entitled to upon the question of his guilt or innocence of the offense alleged against him. Judge Foster, delivering the opinion in the superior court, said that that was correct. (See page 464 and note to page 465.)

The COURT. Has not the Supreme Court of the United States substantially decided this question?

Mr. BLISS. Where?

The COURT. I refer to the case of Hanson vs. Eustace's Lessee, 2 How., 708.

Mr. BLISS. That decision was before the passage of the act.

The COURT. I know that; but the principles laid down in that case are principles which apply to the inferences to be drawn from the refusal of a party to produce evidence after notice.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What did your honor say?

The COURT. I understand the doctrine of the Supreme Court is there settled as to the inferences to be drawn from the refusal of a party to produce written evidence. Of course this decision was made before the law permitted a party to become a witness for himself. But here the man was on the stand and on cross-examination, and he merely reiterated the refusal already made by his counsel over and over again.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And that had been acted upon by the prosecution.

The COURT. And had been acted upon by the prosecution; they had given their secondary evidence.

Mr. KER. The non-production we contend amounts to a failure to answer on cross-examination.

Life and Fire Insurance Company vs. Mechanics' Fire Insurance Company of New York, 7 Wend., 31. I do not think your honor has that authority. This was an action of assumpsit and notice was given to produce books and papers. In the lower court the judge charged the jury that they might give such weight to the refusal to produce the books as they thought proper. Judge Sutherland, in deciding the case, on page 34, says :

The rule is this: The party in such a case may give secondary or parol proof of the contents of such books or papers, if they are shown or admitted to be in the possession of the opposite party ; and if such secondary evidence is imperfect, vague, and uncertain as to dates, sums, boundaries, &c., every intendment and presumption shall be against the party who might remove all doubt by producing the higher evidence.

That is upon a mere refusal, outside of the question of cross examination altogether.

The COURT. That is one of the authorities referred to in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case in 2 Howard.

Mr. KER. It refers to a failure to produce alone ; but we have joined the two, making the separation at the conclusion of the prayer.

Sergeant vs. Fowler, 1 Grant, 355. I do not think your honor has that case. Sergeant was thrown from his horse, and his thigh was injured. Fowler was a doctor, who attended him. He could not determine the nature or the extent of the injury. On the Sunday after the plaintiff, Sergeant, was injured, the doctor brought his son, also a physician, and they both examined the wound and told him that he would have to be cupped, or something of the sort. Fourteen days after the injury complained of the doctor wanted to apply some splints. The patient said he would die in bed anyhow, and he might as well die as to be tortured to death. The plaintiff then got another surgeon, or several of them, and they found that Dr. Fowler had been treating the patient wrongly, and the plaintiff brought the action to recover damages for the fourteen days of suffering and the shortening of his limb, caused by the incompetency of the doctor. Sergeant's counsel, in his closing address to the jury, was allowed to comment upon the fact that Fowler's son was not examined, calling it the damning feature of the case.

The neglect to produce evidence that is known to be in one's power is necessarily suspicious, and thus evidence against him ; and it is on this principle that the court allowed counsel to comment on the defendant's failure to call his son, who aided him in his diagnosis of the case.

There the failure to corroborate himself by his son raised a presumption against him that the superior court said was proper for comment. How much more so was the failure to produce the stub, the letter-book, and the papers that he was asked to produce, and that might corroborate him beyond a doubt, or might stamp his evidence with the stamp of truth.

The COURT. That was a question as to whether the counsel should be allowed to comment upon the failure to produce that proof ; but that is a different question from the right of the court to instruct a jury to draw an inference.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It is not a matter of law at all.

Mr. KER. The Supreme Court says :

The neglect to produce evidence that is known to be in one's power is necessarily suspicious, and thus evidence against him.

That is what the Supreme Court said, and it is on this principle that the court allowed counsel to comment on the defendant's failure to call his son, who aided him in his diagnosis of the case.

Andrews vs. Frye, 104 Mass., 234. This was a suit on a contract or agreement made between plaintiffs and defendants that defendants should assume and pay certain demands against the plaintiffs. The laws of Maine at the time declared that all sales of spirituous and intoxicating liquors should be void with certain exceptions—sales to some county officer that I suppose were necessary. The defendants kept a drug store. Judge Gray, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court, says :

One of the plaintiffs having offered himself as a witness in their behalf—

I presume they were defendants below—was asked on cross-examination whether the plaintiffs had a license to sell intoxicating liquors, and declined to answer. This refusal to answer, like any other refusal to produce evidence in his own power, was competent evidence against him and his partner. A party offering himself as a witness in his own behalf stands differently in this respect from a third person brought into court to testify in a case in which he has no interest.

There the court admitted the testimony not only against the defendant himself, but against his partner who was a codefendant, on the principle, I suppose, that he was a witness for both.

Page vs. Stevens, 1 Post, 357. This is a Michigan case. This was a bill filed by Page to foreclose a mortgage. There was a question as to some payments of money on account of the mortgage. Campbell, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said :

The books are not produced at all. Where so much depends on the fullness and accuracy of the entries, it would be altogether improper and dangerous to dispense with their scrutiny. Every presumption must be against them, when withheld.

That is very strong. Every presumption must be against them when withheld.

John Connors vs. The People, 50 N. Y., 240. The New York statute, I believe, is precisely similar to ours. Connors was indicted for an assault with intent to kill. He became a witness in his own behalf, and upon cross-examination he was asked, "How many times have you been arrested?" The question was objected to, and the objection was overruled. He again refused to answer. The court then asked, "Were you arrested before?" That was objected to. The witness answered, "Yes, sir." Church, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says :

The decision of this court in Brandon vs. The People (42 N. Y., 265) should be controlling upon this point. The prohibition in the Constitution is against compelling an accused person to become a witness against himself. If he consents to become a witness in a case voluntarily and without any compulsion, it would seem to follow that he occupies for the time being the position of a witness with all his rights and privileges, and subject to all his duties and obligations. If he gives evidence that bears against him, it results from his voluntary act in becoming a witness and not from compulsion.

Now, suppose that that witness had said, "I won't answer the question of the court," the same question would arise as here.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That case has been overruled.

Mr. BLISS. You will have an opportunity to reply to it, Mr. Davidge.

The COURT. We will not take it by piece.

Mr. KER. The case of Brandon vs. The People, that is referred to in that decision, is in 42 N. Y., 265.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That was distinctly overruled.

Mr. KER. The prisoner was indicted for larceny. On trial, on the cross-examination, she was asked, "Have you ever been arrested before for theft?" The question was objected to, the objection was overruled, and the defendant answered in the affirmative. The court sustained the question, and the opinion was delivered by Judge Hunt.

Stover vs. The People, 56 N. Y., 315. Stover was charged with receiving $250 in bank bills that had been stolen. The opinion of the superior court was delivered by Judge Grover.

The court, in substance, charged the jury that they were at liberty to consider as a circumstance the failure of the accused, while a witness, to give any account as to where the money found upon him had been kept in the interval from the time he claimed to have received it until it was found. To this portion of the charge his counsel excepted.

* * * * *

It was at the option of the accused whether or not to become a witness. When he has exercised this and become a witness he is made competent for all purposes in the case. If by his own testimony he can explain and rebut a fact tending to show his guilt or innocence, and he fails to do so, the same presumption arises from his failure as would arise from the failure to give an explanation by any other witness, if in his power so to give it. The reason for the presumption is alike in both cases. It arises from the known desire of parties to repel or explain accusatory evidence against them, if within their power, and the basis of the presumption is that the case shows that it is within their power, if innocent; hence the failure tends to show the absence of innocence.

There is more strong language from that court.

Commonwealth vs. Morgan, 107 Mass., 199. Morgan was charged with publishing a libel. He became a witness in his own behalf. He was asked on cross-examination whether he was not the publisher of the Saturday Evening Express. The question was objected to, but the objection was overruled, and he answered. Judge Choate:

By taking the stand as a witness he waived his constitutional privilege of refusing to furnish evidence against himself and subjected himself to be treated as a witness.

Commonwealth vs. Mullen, 97 Mass., 545. Mullen was indicted for being a common seller of intoxicating liquor. On his cross-examination as a witness, this state of affairs arose, that makes it a somewhat peculiar case: Before cross-examination his counsel stated to the court that he offered the witness for the single purpose of testifying whether or not there was or had been any sash in the door, and not for any other purpose. He told the court openly, before he put him on the stand, that he called him for that sole purpose. I apprehend, your honor, that if any other witness was called for a single purpose he could not be taken any further in cross-examination than the purpose for which he was called. The district attorney asked him whether or not there was not a sash with glass in the partition near the door. Defendant's counsel objected, but the objection was overruled, and the answer was given. Judge Bigelow, in giving the decision of the court, says:

Like all other witnesses, he is to tell the truth and the whole truth concerning any matter proper to be inquired about. If he offers himself as a witness he waives his constitutional privilege of refusing to furnish evidence against himself, and may be interrogated as a general witness in the case.

The People vs. Timothy Casey, 72 N. Y., 393. Casey was charged with committing a felonious assault upon John H. O'Brien. He became a witness in his own behalf, and upon cross-examination was asked whether he had been engaged in other altercations and had committed other assaults. Earle, J., page 398, says:

When a prisoner offers himself as a witness in his own behalf, he is subject to the same rules upon cross-examination as in other cases. He may be asked questions disclosing his past life and conduct, and thus impair his credibility. Such questions may tend to show that he has before been guilty of the same crime as that for which he is on trial, but they are not on that account incompetent. When he offers himself as a witness, and seeks to take the benefit of the statute which authorizes him to testify in his own behalf, he takes the hazard of such questions. He must himself determine before he offers himself, whether such examination will benefit or injure him.

I say, your honor, that the nineteenth and twentieth of these prayers are of the same nature. There is a case to be found in volume 9 of The Reporter for 1880, 453.

The COURT. You are on the nineteenth and twentieth prayers now, and have left the sixteenth.

Mr. KER. I told you when I began that they were analogous.

The COURT. You spoke just now of the nineteenth and twentieth?

Mr. KER. Yes, sir. I say the same law applies to both. I am taking those together—the fifteenth, sixteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth. In this case in The Reporter (Williams vs. Commonwealth) there had been a deed executed in the office of Mr. Nichols. Upon the trial before the lower court Mr. Nichols represented one of the parties as counsel. The point was raised that Mr. Nichols ought to have been called as a witness, and as it refers to a case in which Mr. Ingersoll is somewhat interested, I presume it will be interesting to him. Finletter, J., charged the jury:

If Mr. Nichols had knowledge of the matter which he received from his client—

He was for the defendant—

the plaintiffs could not compel him to testify to the knowledge; Mr. Williams could have called him; and when a party has a witness whom he could examine, and does not, the presumption of law is that were he called, his testimony would be against him who could have called him as a witness and did not.

The COURT. You refer now to Betts to contradict Moore?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The cross-examination of Betts, Pelham, R. P. Williamson, and L. P. Williamson.

Mr. KER. I am giving a general reference. Here is Bosler, and here are R. P. and L. P. Williamson, and here are Pelham and Betts, all come in the same category. Even suppose we had not included their names in the prayer, while your honor might think that it would not be worth your while to take up any matter that had not been included, yet I presume your honor will, regardless of the prayers, when you come to discuss the law, give the law as your honor knows it.

The COURT. The court is not obliged to instruct a jury upon questions of law unless his attention is called to them by counsel, though he may do so. The safest way is for counsel to call the attention of the court to any points they wish instructions upon.

Mr. KER. The counsel in this case have been collected from all parts of the Union, and have been used to the differing practice in the States they came from. Your honor has the advantage of having been here before us. I know that when your honor undertakes to state the law to the jury you will tell them the whole of it, without any exclusion, without keeping anything back.

The Supreme Court says in this case in the 9th Reporter:

There is nothing in the error assigned to justify the reversal of the judgment. The record sustains the assertion of the judge complained of in the first assignment, at least substantially. Nor was there any error in the remark which he made as to the argument that Mr. Nichols had not been called by the plaintiff. If there is a competent witness who is not called by a party, it is a presumption which the jury are entitled to draw that his testimony would be unfavorable.

Judgment affirmed.

This is outside of the names mentioned in the prayers. It goes to the very principle that I have been arguing to your honor. Failure to call a witness, failure to answer, failure to produce check-books or letter-books and the papers that were called for on the cross-examination, is a failure that, under the mildly drawn prayer we have offered to your honor, we ask your honor to say to the jury is a suspicious circumstance. His papers, if produced, would possibly be given in evidence against him, and that, as the prayer concludes, "is a circumstance tending to prove his guilt."

Take the case in that shape, omitting the names, and that principle is there; it is found in every case that your honor will take, no matter how it is applied in the abstract.

There is one other case that I will call your honor's attention to, which relates to the second and seventeenth prayers. It is the case of The United States vs. Lyman Cole, 5 McLean, 601.

The COURT. That is a case we have had before.

Mr. MERRICK. The court is familiar with that case.

Mr. KER. I will not read it; it will be a useless waste of time for me to read it, because I think your honor is perfectly familiar with it.

The COURT. It has been referred to before.

Mr. KER. Oh, yes; your honor is as familiar with it as you are with your A, B, C's.

Mr. MERRICK. [To Mr. Ker.] You had better refer to 85 Pennsylvania.

The COURT. Is it Pennsylvania State Reports?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, your honor.

Mr. KER. Commonwealth vs. Bartilson et al., page 483. That is the case in which they pleaded a conspiracy and alleged overt acts. Under the law of Pennsylvania they are not bound to allege overt acts. But in this case they allege overt acts within the statutory period of two years in that State. The court held that the pleading of the overt acts was not a sufficient pleading of the conspiracy.

If on a charge of conspiracy it appears that two persons by their acts are pursuing the same object, and often by the same means, the one performing part of an act, and the other completing it for the attainment of the object, the jury may draw the conclusion that there is a conspiracy. (Roscoe on Criminal Evidence, 415.)

All the leading text writers assert this doctrine, and it is sustained by numerous decisions which it is not necessary to refer to. Acts and declarations of the parties prior to the statutory period may be given in evidence, provided they tend to show a conspiracy existing at the time charged in the indictment. It is true they would not be admissible for the purpose of proving a distinct crime barred by the statute. But where, in conspiracy, an overt act is done within two years, and said act is but one of a series of acts committed by other parties, evidently in pursuance of a common design and to carry out a common purpose, such acts would be evidence, provided they tend to show that the last act was a part of the series and the result of an unlawful combination; and such evidence may satisfy a jury of the existence of a conspiracy at the later period. And this, though some of the prior acts may have occurred at a time when, as an independent conspiracy, it would have been barred by the statute. For, as before said, the overt acts are the evidence from which a conspiracy may be inferred. Hence it is that, while as a general rule in criminal cases, the venue must be laid in the county in which the offense is committed, yet in conspiracy it may be laid in any county in which an overt act has been done by any one of the conspirators.

The particular point there is that in the indictment the conspiracy was charged as of a period beyond the statute of limitations, and the overt act was laid within the statute and claimed to be a renewal. The court decided that the conspiracy should have been charged as of the date of the act within the statute, because that act proved the conspiracy at that time.

Mr. MERRICK. That is, that in pleading it they alleged the conspiracy outside of——

The COURT. [Interposing.] That is, that the overt act was evidence of the offense of conspiracy within the period.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. KER. I have given your honor all that I have here on my notes, and have stated the authorities. If your honor shall need any of them, I shall be very glad to give them to you. With what I have given you we will now submit the prosecution's side of the case.

The COURT. [To the counsel for the defendants.] Gentlemen, have you anything to say in reply to this argument for the prosecution?

Mr. DAVIDGE. May it please your honor, it is, in my judgment, a very remarkable circumstance that the only prayers, with the exception of the last two adverted to by Mr. Ker, which the counsel for the prosecution undertake now to maintain are all obnoxious to the same general criticism. That is, that in the trial of a criminal cause they all undertake to substitute suspicion, surmise, and speculation for evidence.

This experiment is not tried here to-day for the first time. Nothing had been more common in the administration of the criminal law than to endeavor to eke out the insufficiency of evidence by the aid of supposed legal presumptions. But I think I may say that just so often as that experiment has been submitted to the review of appellate courts it has been most signally rebuked. In respect of this general attempt, allow me to read to your honor a passage from a case that has already been brought to the attention of the court—the case of Chaffee & Co. vs. the United States, 18 Wallace, and I read from page 545, near the end of a very extraordinary opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Field. There was a refusal here to produce books and papers, and the judge undertook to elevate the refusal to the dignity of a presumption of law. In other words, he undertook to make it supply the place, by legal intentment, of evidence. Now what did this learned judge, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, say, after commenting on the ruling below?

The purport of all this was to tell the jury that although the defendants must be proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, yet if the Government had made out a prima facie case against them, not one free from all doubt, but one which disclosed circumstances requiring explanation, and the defendants did not explain, the perplexing question of their guilt need not disturb the minds of the jurors; their silence supplied, in the presumptions of the law, that full proof which should dispel all reasonable doubt. In other words, the court instructed the jury, in substance, that the Government need only prove that the defendants were presumptively guilty, and the duty thereupon devolved upon them to establish their innocence, and if they did not they were guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

In that way this fallacy that runs through the fifteenth, sixteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth prayers was disposed of by the Supreme Court. His honor is familiar with those prayers, and I do not now deem it necessary to read any others, and I am under promise to take as little time as cannot be avoided. Apply this criticism to the nineteenth and twentieth prayers, and I think I may say that your honor will not consider them for a moment.

If the jury find that James W. Bosler, R. P. Williamson, L. P. Williamson, Charles Pelham, or either of them, was a person whose testimony would have been material on the part of one or more of the defendants, and was a witness, or were witnesses, that should have been called to testify on behalf of such defendant or defendants, and was or were not called to so testify, the failure to call such witness or witnesses is a circumstance for the jury to consider when deciding upon the evidence against defendant or defendants.

Can there be anything more monstrous than a proposition of that sort? Suppose we did not call witnesses who apparently ought to be called, and we come to tell you why we do not call them, and have a very good reason for not calling them, would your honor listen for a moment to the explanation? Your honor would say at once: "I cannot encumber the trial with your reasons, pro or con, as to why this, that, or the other thing happened, or did not happen." If a party is not to be allowed to explain why he did not call witnesses, are the jury, in utter ignorance of the real situation and the circumstances that influenced the judgment of that party, to draw their blind, wild, inferences? One only has to read these things to dispose of that. The twentieth prayer is:

If the jury find that William H. Betts was a witness whose testimony would have been material on the part of the defendants, and when called to the stand and examined as a witness on the part of the defendants, was not examined or interrogated upon questions that were material in the issue, and in contradiction of the testimony given by A. W. Moore after the foundation having been laid for such contradiction, upon cross-examination, the failure to so examine or interrogate him raises the presumption that the testimony of the witness Betts in that respect would not have been favorable to the defendants, and is a circumstance for the jury to consider when deciding upon the evidence against the defendants.

Now, suppose we began at the beginning of this record and ran through, bringing to the mind of your honor any and every circumstance connected with the management of the cause on the part of the prosecution and the inferences that might or might not be drawn from that management, and sought to base upon that a prayer that would give to the conduct of counsel the force of law, what would you think of it? Now, if these nineteenth and twentieth prayers—and I may make the same remark in respect of the two earlier prayers—mean nothing more than that a jury is at liberty to consider, as we all know a jury will consider, all facts and all circumstances, there is no necessity for making them the subject of instructions from the court to the jury. A practice of that sort is vicious, as calculated to mislead the jury by inducing them to attribute to that circumstance an importance that does not belong to it, based upon the simple fact that the court has thought fit to select it from the great mass of circumstances and make it the subject of a special charge. Now, when the argument was going on I may in all frankness say that it appeared to me that the range of the argument was entirely too wide, both in respect of the prosecution and the defense. It seemed to me that my Brother Ingersoll drew very freely upon what was not done, and that my Brother Merrick drew with exceeding freedom upon what was not done; and that when conduct of that sort passes beyond a certain line we are really trying a case not by the evidence in it, but by the evidence that according to surmise and conjecture might have been in it and ought to have been in it. That is a miserable substitute in a court of justice for that evidence which by the Constitution of the country is to be the foundation of any verdict whereby a citizen is to be deprived of his liberty.

Let me turn for a single minute to these two earlier prayers, the fifteenth and the sixteenth. They belong to the same category. What is the principle? They called for books and papers. They gave us a notice that took in everything, I think, but the after-birth of the defendants. It swept the high sea. It had neither beginning nor end. It was like Milton's description of Satan as he lay on the burning marl, without size and without proportions. They wanted everything. Your honor told them that like Oliver Twist they asked for too much and declined to uphold the notice. They then gave a more restricted notice, but it was in turn a very sweeping one. Your honor held that to be a good notice. I have nothing to say in respect to the ruling. I assume it to have been right. What next? What is the consequence? A party is called upon to produce books and papers and he says very frankly through his counsel, "I will not produce them." What is the result? Where the case is a criminal case, recollect that the man receiving the notice cannot be subjected to any species of coercion by the Government any more than he can be subjected to torture. The right to make him speak or act or produce books or papers or anything else involves simply the principle of torture. Your honor has said, "There is no such principle known to the common law; certainly there is none under the Constitution of the United States; but, gentlemen, you have free scope now to establish by secondary evidence the contents of all these books and all these papers." Your honor said one more thing right there or nearly enough to it to become a part of it. Your honor said that you would not after that allow the defendants to contradict the secondary evidence by the primary evidence; and so the case went on. What, then, was the issue? It was an issue on the secondary evidence. Their witness, and I think I may say their only witness, Rerdell, swore to the content. If anybody will believe Rerdell, they have the benefit of his evidence. Dorsey was put on the stand, and he was asked on cross-examination whether he would produce the books and papers, and he said no. Now, the point is made that you ought to tell this jury, as a matter of law, that the refusal of Dorsey on cross-examination to produce these books and papers after the issue had been narrowed to the limits that I have described, they having the privilege of introducing secondary evidence, and the case proceeding upon that issue, casts a suspicion, as argued by Mr. Ker, upon the whole evidence of the witness. I say, may it please your honor, that such a proposition is simply monstrous. I cannot tell exactly what they mean. It appears to me that my friend, Mr. Ker, is running in the direction of arguing that it is a pre-umption of fact, and then again he takes a higher flight, it appears to me, and maintains a far different proposition, to wit, that it is a presumption of law. If he only means that what fell from Dorsey in this particular or any other particular and the way in which it fell from him, the manner in which he said it, and in every circumstance on examination or cross-examination may be weighed by the jury in determining what weight they will ascribe to the evidence of Dorsey as against the evidence of Rerdell, I cannot see that the prayer is objectionable in substance. But we all know the design of a prayer like that. We all know that such a prayer is designed to mislead; not to guide a jury but to darken. We all know that. We who practice law know that no device is more common than to give an adventitious and false importance to a circumstance or to a segment of a case by prevailing on a judge to elect it from the common mass, and thereby to make it a subject of importance in the estimation of the jury.

Something has been said as to what you would do as to striking out the evidence of Dorsey—not in toto—I do not think that any proposition as wild as that has ever been uttered—but striking it out in respect of this particular department of the case. It would not hurt the case much if you struck it all out in respect of this department, for I presume nobody would attach any weight to the secondary evidence, emanating as it does from Rerdell. It all goes back to that point, as your honor intimated when some time ago the matter was before you. You said secondary evidence must be sufficient, alluding as I supposed to its questionable source; but your honor would not go beyond that. I say, however, that the question what you would do with it is not the point. It is too late now to move to strike out evidence. It would be a very novel practice after the evidence had closed and after the case had gone to the jury, preceded by the longest and loudest speeches in juridical history, to move the court to take up and review the record and repair any damages here and there. All that should have been thought of before the Government announced its case as closed. The Government went to the jury upon that case, and not upon a case to be manufactured or restated or remade at this stage of the argument. That is all I desire to say. I do not doubt that the jury have the right to consider all the circumstances in determining the weight which they will attach to the testimony of a witness; but I know perfectly well that no acts and no words will fall from your honor that in any respect will be calculated to give undue importance to a fact, but that you will remit any presumption of fact involved in these four prayers to which I have called your honor's attention, in common with all other presumptions of fact, to the arbitrament of this jury.

Now, to go back to number two for a minute. What is number two? I will not even read it. That is the result of another common device, as old as Government, as old as tyranny. What does it mean? If you will read it carefully you will find it means simply this: That the acts of parties alleged to be coconspirators may take the place of the great central fact whether there was a coconspiracy. You will find, I think, that, ex industria, that second prayer is the play of Hamlet with the Prince of Denmark omitted. You will find that the common design is omitted. You will find that the combination of minds is omitted, and that the design of the prayer is to lead up this jury from acts that may be innocent, from those co-ordinate, coincident acts, to the grand central fact which is after all to be found by the jury, suppressing the element of combination and the element of common design that I know has been prominent in your honor's mind throughout this case. With the second prayer there was something said about another one, the seventeenth. I think I ought to read that. It is impossible to state it without reading it. There is not enough in it to inhere long enough in my mind to enable me to state it. I am not sure it is not true. It is true if platitudes are true:

SEVENTEENTH.

A conspiracy is rarely, if ever, proved by positive testimony. When a crime of high magnitude is about to be perpetrated by a combination of individuals, they do not act openly, but covertly and secretly.

I suppose the jury understand all about that, as do the officers of the prosecution. They did not need three men to be commissioned by the Department of Justice to tell them that.

The purpose formed is known only to those who enter into it.

That may or may not be. Generally I think it is true.

Their guilt can generally be proved only by circumstantial evidence.

Often it is so and often it is not. This is a Bunsby declaration.

It is said by some writers on evidence that such circumstances are stronger than positive proof.

Some say one way and some say the other way. Everything, after all, depends upon the circumstances themselves. I suppose there is no standard of weight in the matter. I am not aware that Congress, in dealing in the subject of weights and measures, has done anything in this department.

A witness swearing positively, it is said, may misapprehend the fact or swear falsely—

We all know that is true. I wonder they admitted so much—but that circumstances cannot lie. The common design is the essence of the charge—

That is true; very true.

And this may be made to appear when the defendants steadily pursue the same object, whether acting separately or together, by common or different means, all leading to the same unlawful result.

That is true, if they will only insert the heart to the prayer, the Hamlet of the play. That is, by a combination of minds, each knowing the part to be performed by the other; not the details of that part, but generally or in detail the part to be performed by the other or the others—in other words, each animated by a common design. Coincident lines culminating in a center, per se, do not make crime, unless the jury find that the virus of guilt is in those centripetal lines that meet in a common center. That is all I have to say about their prayers.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No. You have not discussed the thirteenth.

Mr. DAVIDGE. But they have not argued the thirteenth.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is an objection to it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I cannot go over them all in the limited time that I have.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Ask the court to read it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I suppose the court will read them all. I am very sorry for the court. Is there anything in the thirteenth prayer, especially, I mean? There is something in all of them. Let us see as a matter of curiosity what the thirteenth is. Ah, yes; it is a funny prayer. I will read it. Now, just listen to this, your honor. I am very sorry I even thought of passing it.

THIRTEENTH.

If the jury find that the testimony of the witness, Rerdell, though that of an accomplice, is corroborated by other testimony in the case and circumstances that have been adduced in evidence, such testimony is not to be discredited because it is that of an accomplice. Therefore—

Ergo, in other words—

if the jury are satisfied that said testimony is true in any material part thereof, and that in such material part it has been confirmed by unimpeachable evidence, such confirmation affords reasonable ground for belief that such testimony is true in all its other parts.

That is another illustration of the disease of these gentlemen, that is to take everything in the way of presumption from the jury and remit it to the court. They do not seem to recognize the fact that there is such a thing as an inference to be drawn by that tribunal, but that every inference is an inference of law and entitled to that dignity. They do not stop there. They go on and say—and I put the case, for I am not here to reflect in any degree upon Mr. Rerdell but only speak hypothetically—that a rascal who swears all around a circle and is confirmed in a segment, perhaps a very narrow segment, perhaps a little arc of a very large circumference, is presumed to tell the truth all around that circle; and it is not only a presumption but a presumption of law. I say that it is just the opposite. I say that with the most remarkable talent for stating things upside down they invert the principle of law, that principle being that a party, not even an informer but only declaring himself to be an informer is to be so treated. We do not accredit Rerdell with the dignity, you observe of being an informer. They wanted to decorate him in that way, but we say he is no informer at all but only a party claiming to be an informer. For that reason such a party is to be corroborated, I will not say in every minute detail, but in such manner and in respect of every essential and material piece of evidence as to induce the jury to accept him.

The COURT. I suppose you use the word informer in the sense of accomplice, because I see nothing at all in the rule which disparages the testimony of an accomplice applicable to the case of an informer who is a mere spy in the employ of the Government and not implicated in the commission of the crime itself at all.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I am simply now discussing the principle of this prayer. I say in one of my prayers that the rule is this, and I have taken some pains to state it:

FIFTY-FIRST.

A witness professing to be an informer—

It ought to be an accomplice, under the correction of your honor, but it escaped me at the time I wrote it—is, on that ground alone, declared by a rule of law unworthy of belief unless corroborated, but such corroboration is of no avail whatever when from the evidence of such witness it is apparent that he has deliberately testified falsely in relation to any material fact. In such case another rule of law places such witness beyond the pale of belief.

Surely your honor would not give this prayer. If good in other respects your honor surely would not give it without appending to it the very important qualification that if this man has deliberately lied in respect of any material fact his sin is not washed out by corroboration. He is denounced as much and more by the second rule of law than by the first rule, although it may be the denunciation of the first rule was removed by the cleansing process of such corroboration, as I have mentioned to your honor.

There are some things that we want to call to your honor's attention with regard to our prayers, and in order to save time I will endeavor to discuss them from the stand-point of principles, grouping together as many prayers as I can to illustrate the particular principle.

The COURT. The Government may wish to reply to your argument on their prayers.

Mr. DAVIDGE. You would not have that now.

Mr. MERRICK. We prefer to have them open on their prayers. Let us have one argument of it all.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I do not care. We will not get through to-day.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, yes, we will.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; we will get through.

Mr. CHANDLER. Our prayers so plainly contain correct principles that we need not say much with regard to them.

The COURT. It is not too late in the day to be economizing minutes.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I will do anything that your honor wishes.

The COURT. Take your own course.

Mr. CARPENTER. Why not take a recess first?

Mr. MERRICK. Need we take a recess to-day?

Mr. CARPENTER. We might take one for half an hour.

The COURT. Do you want a recess?

Mr. MERRICK. I have no right to speak.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I suppose the close by the Government will not transcend the limits of the opening, and will not discuss any other prayers than those discussed by Mr. Ker.

The COURT. The closing speech must be a reply.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I suppose so. Otherwise we would be taken at a disadvantage.

Mr. WILSON. The court will understand us as objecting to all these instructions.

The COURT. When the court gives instructions to the jury that will be the time for you to take your exceptions.

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We do not want the court to understand that the prayers we do not argue against we admit to be correct.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We are only replying to their views.

The COURT. [To the counsel for the prosecution.] What course do you propose to take? Have you anything to say in reply to Mr. Davidge's argument?

Mr. MERRICK. Will they not open on their prayers before we reply? I supposed they were going to pursue that course.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I take it all back.

Mr. MERRICK. Your first views are generally right. After meditation you generally take the wrong course.

Mr. DAVIDGE. No doubt you think the first is right because it was rather in your favor. That is another surmise of yours.

Mr. MERRICK. Hardly a greater surmise than yours as to the second.

The COURT. Well, Mr. Davidge, if you choose to go on you can open on your prayers.

Mr. DAVIDGE. My brethren are of a different opinion, and I yield to them.

The COURT. Then we will hear a reply to Mr. Davidge's argument.

Mr. MERRICK. If we are going to take any recess let us take it now for fifteen or twenty minutes. I do not care whether we have a recess or not.

The COURT. I do not care about any recess.

Mr. MERRICK. I will consult with the Attorney-General a moment with reference to what we had better do. [After consulting with the Attorney-General who was in court.] We will reply hereafter to the whole when they open upon their prayers. We only want one more speech on our side.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, we claim the right to open and close as to our prayers. They have the right to open and close as to theirs.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Certainly.

Mr. MERRICK. I deny that right.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then let us settle it now.

Mr. MERRICK. I deny that right. The plaintiff opens and closes upon the prayers when presented, generally. That is the universal rule in this court, if I am not mistaken. There is probably the most venerable patriarch of the bar beside your honor, a gentleman who knows better than any one else as to the practice here.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I think my opinion ought to have some weight, because I have been engaged in practice at this bar for some time. I am willing to have it either one way or the other. I do not attach any great importance to a closing argument addressed to the court. I will be glad to know whether the idea is that if I go on and open on our prayers that in reply to me they will reply as regards our prayers and what I have said in regard to theirs together, and then we close.

Mr. MERRICK. We claim the close.

The COURT. I understand the practice to be that when the prayers are submitted on both sides, the plaintiff or the prosecution, as the case may be, opens and closes.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That was my impression at the beginning. Mr. Ker then should go on and say what he has to say about ours.

Mr. MERRICK. He has nothing to say about yours now.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Then this is no argument.

Mr. MERRICK. We have nothing to say in the opening about your prayers.

Mr. WILSON. According to that the result would be this: The prosecution would go on and offer their prayers, and we would discuss them, and they would have the opening and the close; and we offer ours and offer our reasons for them, and they answer, and we reply, and the argument would be governed by the simple question as to whether or not we offered our prayers when they offered theirs. We submitted our prayers and let them go into the record, to the end that all parties might have an opportunity to examine them. We certainly did not intend to give the prosecution any advantage by so doing. I never would have presented a prayer to the court in advance if I had supposed that by the simple matter of putting them into the record so that everybody could see them we were to be deprived of a substantial right.

The COURT. It is a mere matter of practice.

Mr. WILSON. Is it not the practice, your honor, that the prosecution offer their prayers and have the right to open and close; and after their discussion have not we the right—

The COURT. [Interposing.] No. Before the court proceeds to instruct the jury both sides are expected to submit their prayers, and the prayers are argued after they have been thus submitted, the prosecution opening and closing upon the whole.

Mr. MERRICK. I think Brother Wilson misunderstood me, your honor.

The COURT. In the opening in this case Mr. Ker has not made any reference at all in regard to your prayer.

Mr. WILSON. Not at all.

The COURT. I do not see that that is any reason why you should complain. You can go on and open your prayers with two counsel; but the other side—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I was going to remark, if your honor please, that Mr. Wilson misapprehended me if he thought that I based the rule as to the relation of the parties to the argument upon the circumstance simply that the prayers are all presented together. The rule is this: That when the prayers are presented they shall be all presented together, with the right reserved, of course, of bringing in any others incidentally that may become necessary by the developments of the argument, and that the plaintiff or the prosecution opens and closes.

The COURT. I think that is the practice.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know about that. Perhaps my familiarity with the practice in this court is not sufficient to authorize me to speak. I supposed after arguing all the instructions that have been asked we may then present other prayers for instructions and argue them.

Mr. MERRICK. They go without argument.

Mr. WILSON. No; they do not.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

The COURT. The court would not hear argument upon a further proposition. It would take the proposition and instruct upon it.

Mr. WILSON. I beg to say that I have never yet known any rule which cut out counsel from bringing a legal principle before the court.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the stenographer will go back to what was said before Mr. Ker opened, I think it will then appear that an arrangement was made, and that it was this: That Mr. Ker would open as to their prayers, and that we should reply, and then they should say what they desired, and that thereupon we would call the attention of the court to such of our prayers as we desired. That was the way I understood it.

The COURT. I do not know whether there was any such understanding or not.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not know of any such. Your honor can see the absurdity of such a proceeding, if you will allow me to use that word in this particular. Their prayers are the converse of ours, and in two or three instances, I think, the negative is used in reference to our prayers.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Davidge, in discussing our thirteenth immediately proceeded to take their fifty-first as substantially the converse of it, or what would appear to be a modification of it. Such instances run all the way through.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I only did it in my argument to illustrate my objection to their thirteenth.

Mr. MERRICK. We have said all we desire until we make the closing argument.

The COURT. You have said all that you will be permitted to say until the close.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the court take a recess for half an hour?

Mr. BLISS. Had we not better settle as to what shall be done?

Mr. MERRICK. It is settled.

The COURT. It is settled. Mr. Davidge, or whoever is to make the argument, will go on. He is to close in answer to you and open as to his own prayers. That was the common-law practice before we changed the practice of addressing the jury.

Mr. BLISS. As to our recess, does your honor mean just half an hour? We will probably want all our time in the argument to-day.

The COURT. We can prolong it a little.

Mr. BLISS. I was in hopes we would not. I think we can get through with our recess in half an hour. We ordinarily take a little more time than that.

The COURT. Very well. Say until two o'clock. That will be forty minutes.

At this point (1 o'clock and 20 minutes) the court took a recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

The COURT. Mr. Davidge, are you ready to proceed?

Mr. DAVIDGE. May it please your honor, the counsel for the defense have availed themselves of the recess to confer together, and have reached the conclusion that further argument of our prayers is unnecessary. If they do not commend themselves to your honor's mind, we think we cannot enforce them by argument. Hence, acting for myself and for my brethren, I submit the prayers for the defense.

Mr. BLISS. With reference to the prayers of the defendants I will call your honor's attention to only a few of them.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We have not argued them, and under the ruling there is nothing open.

Mr. BLISS. I submit that there is. Having stated at the opening to-day that they would argue certain of the prayers and not argue certain others, we certainly were entitled to expect that they would carry out that arrangement, and that we would have a right to reply.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The ruling of the court is that the Government had a right to open upon all the prayers. They chose to open upon only a few offered by them, I think four or five. Then we had a right to cover the whole field. I confined myself to the propositions of law advanced by the Government. Now they have the reply to my argument.

Mr. MERRICK. It is a matter with your honor entirely, of course. There is no rule about any such matter as that. If they do not choose to argue their prayers we can go on and argue them during the time which has been allotted to us. The time was divided between the two sides, and we have the right to consume our time.

The COURT. There was no apportionment of the time, as I remember.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor will notice that on the adjournment on Friday there was a stipulation that the argument should close to-day.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Will you agree to close to-day? That is the point.

Mr. BLISS. One moment. The stipulation was this:

Mr. BLISS. I think there will be no trouble in closing the argument on Monday, if the defense confine themselves to anything like the time they intimate.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am willing the court should limit us to Monday.

Mr. BLISS. If your honor will limit us to Monday, we will divide the time with the other side.

Mr. WILSON. Will you do that now?

Mr. BLISS. Of course, we will divide the time with the other side.

Mr. WILSON. And close to-day?

Mr. BLISS. And close to-day. We expect to, of course.

Mr. WILSON. "Expect to." That is not what I want.

Mr. MERRICK. If the court wants to hear any argument, it will intimate what it wants.

Mr. BLISS. We have no right to argue beyond to-day, and do not expect to argue beyond to-day. I will say that without any hesitation. We want to finish up to-day as much as anybody.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I presume your honor will settle the matter.

The COURT. If they don't choose to go on now, where will that place you? Do you insist upon your right to present your views in regard to their prayers?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That ought to have been done in the beginning.

The COURT. And then they have their reply?

Mr. BLISS. I suppose so.

The COURT. That is what they claim and what you resisted before.

Mr. MERRICK. I differ with Mr. Bliss about that. Now is their chance.

Mr. BLISS. We have the close of the whole thing, beyond all question.

The COURT. On that theory of opening and closing both sets of prayers together you have the opening and closing. If they do not choose to reply to your opening, that shuts off your closing.

Mr. MERRICK. That would be the case with a jury, but is it so with the court, your honor? We are helping the court.

The COURT. I think the rule of argument applies as well to one case as to the other. Still, as to some of these prayers, I should myself like to have some light.

Mr. MERRICK. You have a right to call for it, of course.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think, if the court please, that this argument started out upon a misapprehension. It certainly did, as far as I was concerned. My idea was that the Government was to present such views as they pleased with regard to their own prayers. It seems that Mr. Ker confined himself entirely to the prayers of the Government.

Then he said that we had the right to reply to what they might say, and that they would close on their prayers. That is the way I understood it. Secondly, that we would then give such ideas as we might wish to present to the court on our prayers, that they would reply, and that we would close. I think the argument started out with that view.

The COURT. It did start out in that way. Mr. Ker, however, confined himself in his opening to his own prayers.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor says it started out in that way. I may say to your honor what our understanding of it was. We may have been wrong. Our understanding of the matter was this: that Mr. Ker in his opening was to confine himself to our prayers; that then they were to reply upon our prayers, and to state their views upon such of their prayers as they desired to call your honor's attention to, and that then we were to have the final close. That was the view with which Mr. Ker started out, inasmuch as they said expressly that many of their prayers they did not propose to discuss, and it would save time not to have them discussed. We decided at the moment that it was of no use to discuss in the opening such of their prayers as they did not intend to discuss, and therefore we would wait until they had come in with their discussion and meet it. That was our view. We may have been wrong in the understanding. We understood, your honor will therefore see, that we were to open as to our prayers alone, and they were then to reply and open as to theirs, and we were to reply on all.

The COURT. They waive then, as I understand, the opening on all their prayers, and the argument so far seems to have gone on that theory. Mr. Davidge waives the opening upon their prayers.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Upon ours.

The COURT. Yes. The Government may present such views in regard to their prayers now as it thinks proper.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And then we will have the close.

The COURT. Yes; you can have the close.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is fair.

Mr. BLISS. I thought the understanding this morning was that we had the close on the whole case.

The COURT. I thought so, too; but there seems to have been a misunderstanding in respect of Mr. Ker's speech. Mr. Ker is dull of hearing, and probably he did not hear all that was said.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Ker did precisely what we understood was to be done, and did it after consultation with us. There is no question about that.

The COURT. There is no doubt about what the general impression was at that time, that the opening was to be on your side, and then the other side was to follow, and you were to have the close upon the whole. I think that is the usual practice. My Brother Bradley, who is high unwritten authority on the subject, says that that has been the practice of the court.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor will see that certainly we ought not to be required to open upon their prayers and then they close upon them. They have not said a word upon their prayers. That, your honor, it seems to me, is putting us to the height of disadvantage. We will accept their arrangement. They do not desire to say anything on their prayers and we do not desire to say anything more. The prayers may be considered as closed.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, we have three or four additional prayers.

Mr. BLISS. Oh, no, indeed.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is altogether in the discretion of the court. The court may allow prayers to be offered up to the last moment. We do not propose any argument on them.

Mr. WILSON. I am not going to argue them, but simply to read them.

The COURT. If you do not propose to have any argument, very well.

Mr. BLISS. Even then, I submit that these gentlemen cannot sit here with their prayers all ready to put in and wait until there is no further chance for argument and then offer the prayers. If they had drawn them in consequence of the argument or had evolved them from something that had occurred in the argument, it would be natural to offer them now; but I submit to offer them in this way is not pursuing a decent and orderly course.

Mr. DAVIDGE. To offer prayers on propositions of law is a legal right which exists at any time before the jury leaves the court-room to deliberate upon their verdict.

Mr. BLISS. I am not disputing that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Then it comes to the question of argument. My Brother Wilson does not propose to argue these prayers. If your honor should desire argument from the other side or from this side a matter of that sort would belong to the discretion of the court and you would order an argument. There will be no trouble about that.

The COURT. We will hear the prayers.

Mr. MERRICK. Allow me to say that, as I understand Mr. Bliss, the objection is this: That when the prayers were all submitted and it was understood that they were all submitted and given to the court the prayers now offered were in the pocket of the counsel.

Mr. BLISS. Certainly, that was my view.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is an entire mistake.

Mr. WILSON. Let me explain. I want to let my Brother Merrick into the secret.

Mr. MERRICK. Do. I would like to hear some of those mysteries.

Mr. WILSON. This morning after 10 o'clock, after having read their prayers, I dictated these prayers to my short-hand clerk, and they were brought to me since I sat down at this table. They were never in long-hand until after the court met this morning.

The COURT. We will hear them. It is the right of the counsel to submit prayers up to the last moment before the jury retires.

Mr. MERRICK. Unquestionably.

Mr. WILSON. My Brother Chandler was present when I dictated them. [Reading:]

ONE HUNDRED AND FIRST.

Before granting increase of service or expedition of service the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was not bound to go over these routes himself, nor was he bound to send out any special agents to examine into them or into the necessity for such service. If the people petitioned for such increase or expedition, or both, and if such petitions were indorsed by Senators and Members of Congress, or if the people asked for such increase or expedition, or both, or if Senators and Members of Congress recommended such increase or expedition, or both, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General had the right to presume that such persons so recommending were acquainted with the routes and with the improvements and industries that were springing up in that new country, and the present and prospective needs for the service, and such petitions and other recommendations would justify him in granting such increase and expedition.

ONE HUNDRED AND SECOND.

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that on the representations of a large number of reputable citizens, including members of Congress, that additional mail facilities were badly needed by the people living along or adjacent to the several routes in question; that the regions of country were being rapidly settled up; that the resources of the country were being developed; that additional mail facilities were requisite to aid in this development and as an inducement to the people to settle there, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General had a right to act upon such petitions as being true representations of the condition of the country and of the need of the service, and if he made orders upon such petitions and recommendations the jury would not be justified in drawing any inference in this case that in making such orders he was engaged in a conspiracy or actuated by improper motives.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRD.

Unless it has been shown by the testimony beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant Brady did not act in good faith, on the evidence before him, on the matters complained of in the indictment, you should acquit the defendant Brady.

The COURT. That is involved in several prayers already in.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I will take advantage of this little lull to say to the court that I prefixed those of the prayers that I drew with a statement that they were severally offered to the court. In the record I fear they all appear as offered en masse. That, your honor knows, would be objectionable. I hope, therefore, they will be considered by your honor as independent.

Mr. WILSON. They are separate and independent offers.

Mr. BLISS. I take it on either side each prayer is considered as offered separately. There is no question about that.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let it so appear on the record, and there will be no trouble about it.

Mr. WILSON. [Continuing to read:]

ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTH.

The court charges the jury that though they may believe from the evidence that the defendants interested in the contracts described in the indictment made personal efforts to and did secure an increase of service under said contracts, and that in accomplishing that result they employed means similar in their character to means employed by other defendants upon other routes, and conducted their business under said contracts in a manner entirely similar to the conduct of the business of other defendants on their routes, that such similarity of conduct of the business of the respective defendants does not afford evidence of a conspiracy between the several defendants charged in this indictment.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTH.

If the jury believe, from the evidence in this case, that Vaile and Miner were interested in certain routes, separate and distinct, and wholly independent of Stephen W. Dorsey; that Stephen W. Dorsey was interested in certain routes wholly disconnected with and separate from those held by Vaile and Miner; and if the jury believe that Vaile and Miner, in respect of their routes, were pursuing methods for the purpose of obtaining increase or expedition of service, or both independent of the said Stephen W. Dorsey, and that Stephen W. Dorsey was pursuing similar methods in respect of his route, but independent of and distinct from Vaile and Miner, such acts of the said Vaile and Miner, and of Dorsey, separate and distinct from each other, and having no relation to each other, would not be evidence proving or tending to prove a conspiracy.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTH.

In the discharge of his duty as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, the defendant, Brady, had the right to so order the service on any route established by Congress as would secure the transmission of the mails in the most direct and speedy manner; and if there were routes circuitous, and by reason of circuitry, occasioning delay in the transmission of the mails, and there were other routes upon which the mails could be transmitted more directly and more speedily, he had the right to so increase and expedite the service on the direct routes as would secure the object just mentioned, and if he did so no inference of guilt can be drawn therefrom against him in this case.

Mr. HENKLE. If the court please, Mr. Vaile has prepared a few instructions this morning which he desired me to present to the court.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTH.

The act of Congress required that all official papers upon which orders are made shall be filed with the true date of their filing marked upon them, and any paper or papers not thus marked or without any file marks, is presumed to be a paper not acted upon by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, unless the jury believe from the evidence it was one of the papers taken into consideration.

The COURT. There are only two instances of that sort, I think.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is all.

Mr. HENKLE. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. Where the papers were found among other papers on the route.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Afterwards.

Mr. HENKLE. [Continuing to read:]

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTH.

It is not enough to state in an indictment for conspiracy in a general way that the defendants agreed to write, or cause to be written, false and fraudulent petitions, and did file false and fraudulent petitions, &c., with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, but such petitions thus impeached should have been set out in the indictment in full, and their false and fraudulent character described, so that the defendants might know of what offense they were charged that they may be prepared to meet it.

The defendants cannot tell from this indictment which of the multitudinous petitions filed on these nineteen routes will be relied upon by the Government to establish the charge. Nor is this uncertainty helped out by the averments with respect to overt acts.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINTH.

The writing and filing of petitions and the making of statements in the form of affidavits is not criminal in and of itself; and to make them so such petitions and statements should have been set out in the indictment and their criminal character described, or such facts stated in regard to them as would clearly show that their innocent character is changed to a criminal one.

ONE HUNDRED AND TENTH.

Indictments are the basis of all criminal prosecutions, and should be broad enough to receive all the evidence that may be offered to prove its averments; and evidence cannot be used to help out defective or too narrow averments in the same. False affidavits do not necessarily mean altered affidavits. If any affidavits have been altered or changed, the pleader knew this before the indictment was drawn; and if they expected to rely upon that as evidence of crime, it should have so averred and set out.

The COURT. These are points that were raised at a preliminary stage.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, all of them.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Your honor has a copy of the prayers of the defense. Will you be kind enough to turn to page 5789, and to the end of the fifty-third prayer?

The COURT. The last paragraph?

Mr. DAVIDGE. Yes. I want to strike out the last line and the word "be" in the preceding line:

Because that is not the kind of conspiracy charged in the indictment.

Those words were added by mistake by another party, and as I drew the prayer I stopped at the word "indictment." Will your honor draw your pencil through the words I have read?

The COURT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. I understand that the counsel on the other side decline to argue their prayers, and therefore we are stopped. I want that to appear on the report.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Merrick does not want it to appear on the record that this is by virtue of any agreement with counsel.

Mr. MERRICK. That is all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We do not claim that at all. We do not wish to put you or anybody in a false position at all. The record shows that we decline to argue further.

Mr. MERRICK. Decline to argue their prayers. Does the court desire to hear further from the Government on any of these prayers?

The COURT. I must say that I have not read them all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We are perfectly willing that the Government should read their prayers and we will read ours, so that they will all be read.

Mr. MERRICK. You have over one hundred prayers.

Mr. INGERSOLL. They are very short. We will only read such as we want the court to hear.

Mr. BLISS. They are probably now making up for their past deficiencies in praying.

The COURT. I see that the eighty-eighth, ninety-first, and ninety-second prayers are likely to impose a good deal of investigation on the part of the court, and I may be driven to taking a short cut on them. The eighty-eighth prayer says :

The court instructs the jury that it is charged in said indictment that the said defendants at a certain date filed, or caused to be filed, in the Post-Office Department—

1. False petition on route 34149.
2. False oath on route 34149, &c.

* * * * *

Now, unless the jury believe, from the evidence, that said oaths, petitions, and subcontract were filed on the dates charged in the said indictment, they will disregard each and all as overt acts. And in making up their verdict, the jury cannot take the filing of the aforesaid petitions, oaths, and subcontract into consideration as overt acts.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All those were filed before the 20th of May, 1879.

The COURT. Your prayer does not set out when they were filed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The record shows that they were all filed before May 20, 1879.

The COURT. I could ascertain, of course, by going over the evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the court would like to have me, I will put the date opposite each one.

The COURT. In the ninety-first prayer you say :

The jury are further instructed that in making up their verdict they cannot take into consideration as overt acts the following, to wit :

Filing subcontracts by Dorsey and others on different routes.

For these reasons, namely :

- (1) The allegation is not properly pleaded. It is not sufficient to say that they fraudulently sent a paper.
- (2) It is impossible to fraudulently file a subcontract; and
- (3) Because of variance in regard to date of filing subcontracts on routes 38150 and 40104, they having been filed before the 23d day of May, 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. I suppose that is a matter for the jury to find.

The COURT. The ninety-second prayer is :

The jury are further instructed that they cannot take into consideration as overt acts, in making up their verdict, the following orders charged to have been made by

1. The order of March 8, 1881 (page 28), &c.
- Thomas J. Brady, to wit :

Mr. INGERSOLL. We set out on that twenty-three orders.

The COURT. Then the reasons are given :

NOTE.—The reasons : Because not charged to have been done in pursuance of the conspiracy, or to effect the object thereof.

The Government having failed to prove that they were ever certified to the Auditor.

Now, there is a question which I should like to hear argued. I have heretofore noted that the indictment in setting out a number of acts—and perhaps they are these—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] These are they.

The COURT.—Set out that they have been fraudulently made, or that the acts were fraudulently done by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and does not say that they were made in pursuance of the conspiracy.

Mr. WILSON. Nor to effect the object of the conspiracy.

The COURT. I should like to hear from the prosecution whether they claim that those acts set out in the indictment, and described merely as fraudulent acts, are claimed to be acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy.

Mr. BLISS. We do, sir, so claim ; covered, if by nothing else, by the general allegation on page 15, I think it is, of the indictment, where it is alleged what the process was :

Did fraudulently and maliciously combine, confederate, conspire, and agree together, between, and amongst themselves, by means of the said John W. Dorsey—

And the others—

then and there fraudulently to write and sign, and cause and procure to be written and signed, a large number of fraudulent letters and communications, and false and fraudulent petitions—

Going on and reciting the whole details all the way down.

Mr. DAVIDGE. But there you are stating the means.

The COURT. The statute creates a new offense, composed of two elements: One, the old conspiracy, and the other, an overt act in pursuance of it. The overt act is made necessary to complete the conspiracy. Now here are a number of acts done by Brady which are charged to have been fraudulently done, and yet not charged to have been done in pursuance of the conspiracy. Now I ask the counsel for the Government to show in the indictment where that apparent defect is cured.

Mr. BLISS. I also call your honor's attention to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The United States vs. James H. Britton and Barton Bates, made at this term, in which opinion is the following:

The offense charged in the counts of this indictment is a conspiracy. This offense does not consist of both the conspiracy and the acts done to effect the object of the conspiracy, but of the conspiracy alone. The provision of the statute, that there must be an act done to effect the object of the conspiracy, merely affords a locus penitentiæ, so that before the act done either one or all of the parties may abandon their design, and thus avoid the penalty prescribed by the statute. It follows as a rule of criminal pleading that in an indictment for conspiracy under section 5440 the conspiracy must be sufficiently charged, and that it cannot be aided by the averments of acts done by one or more of the conspirators in furtherance of the object of the conspiracy.

Your honor will see that that decision is distinctly to the effect that the offense does not consist of both the conspiracy and the acts done.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will you not read the last line again?

Mr. BLISS. [Reading:]

This offense does not consist of both the conspiracy and the acts done to effect the object of the conspiracy, but of the conspiracy alone. The provision of the statute that there must be an act done to effect the object of the conspiracy merely affords a locus penitentiæ, so that before the act done either one or all of the parties may abandon their design, and thus avoid the penalty prescribed by the statute.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Go on.

Mr. BLISS. I have read all that I called his honor's attention to. I will hand this up to your honor.

Mr. WILSON. In that same connection I simply desire to call attention to the sixty-second prayer, on pages 5791 and 5792. It is really the same as that read by your honor, except that one itemizes them and the other speaks of them by reference to pages. Then the sixty-third, sixty-fourth, sixty-fifth, and sixty-sixth—

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] I do not think, your honor, in the last case that the Supreme Court intended to repeal the statute. All that they meant to say was that the conspiracy was the gravamen of the offense, and not that other element which must cohere in order to make out the statutory crime. I find in a preceding case (United States vs. Hirsch, 100 United States, 34) they put it this way:

The gravamen of the offense here is the conspiracy. For this there must be more than one person engaged. Although by the statute something more than the common-law definition of a conspiracy is necessary to complete the offense, to wit, some act done to effect the object of the conspiracy, it remains true that the combination of minds in an unlawful purpose is the foundation of the offense.

Now, taking these two together, it is perfectly apparent what the Supreme Court meant. They meant not to eliminate the second element, but simply to indicate that the primary element was the conspiracy, and not that the secondary one was unnecessary.

Mr. BLISS. I will have to call the attention of the court to the opinion itself as to what the Supreme Court meant.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Apart from any statute, I suppose that at common-law an overt act, although unnecessary to be set out, yet, if set out, must be set out just as required by the statute—in pursuance of and to effect the object of the conspiracy.

The COURT. At common-law I do not suppose it was necessary to set out the overt act at all.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It was not necessary, but, whenever inserted, it ought to be pleaded always as in pursuance of and to effect the object of the conspiracy.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it be proper for me to hand the court a list of authorities upon that one point?

The COURT. Hand them to the other side.

Mr. MERRICK. I will reply to them if any authorities are to be handed in.

The COURT. The other side have a right to know that they are handed in, and to see the list.

Mr. MERRICK. And to reply.

The COURT. Yes, if they choose.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I suppose I might answer what they might say.

Mr. MERRICK. This is child's play.

The COURT. It is not likely that I shall have time to examine all your authorities.

Mr. DAVIDGE. As there are about fifty of them, I suppose not, your honor.

The COURT. I do not know whether counsel are in despair of doing anything with the court, as the reason why they do not argue their points. I acknowledge that there are some things upon which my mind has been pretty well settled, and one of those things is that, in consequence of our statute, there could be no conviction for conspiracy alone where the crime of conspiracy is not followed by an overt act. The law requires an overt act to complete the crime of conspiracy, and that where overt acts are set out in the indictment, as they must be, those overt acts must be specially, distinctly, and accurately set out, and must be declared—that is my impression—to have been acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy. It has been my belief, and it was upon this point that I cared particularly to hear from the counsel for the Government, that where a certain act is set out in the indictment as an act done by one of the conspirators, it may be treated, in the first place, as one of the means of carrying on the conspiracy, and in that respect it is not to be treated in any other way than as a means of carrying out the conspiracy; but if it is intended to be an overt act, it must be set out as an overt act done in pursuance of the conspiracy; that the mere statement that it was a fraudulent act would not be sufficient for that purpose; and I have called upon counsel for the Government to show some place in the indictment where these acts are that are set out in this prayer.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Two prayers, or three or four.

The COURT. Two or three prayers, where they have been set out as acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy. As I read the indictment, these acts are declared to be fraudulent acts, but not acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy. There are other acts which are properly pleaded. I have not my copy of the indictment here, but I have it at my house. If I had that I could refer to the "In pursuance" point.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I have my copy here.

Mr. WILSON. There is not a single one of these orders set out in the indictment, alleged to have been made to effect the object of the conspiracy.

Mr. MERRICK. I will look at it more carefully. Mr. Ker does not seem to be in court just now. He supposed the argument would continue, and expected to be back again. This indictment is under his particular care. The ninety-second prayer refers to page 28, and so on. I suppose some of the charges upon that route are the charges upon the other routes, and the charges there in reference to the overt acts begin on page 27 of the indictment:

And that thereupon, and in pursuance of, and to effect the object of their unlawful, fraudulent, and malicious combination, confederacy, conspiracy, and agreement as aforesaid, the said John W. Dorsey, Montfort C. Rerdell, and Stephen W. Dorsey, afterwards, to wit, on the 11th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine, * * * within the jurisdiction of said court, did fraudulently file, and cause and procure to be filed in said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, among the papers relating and pertaining to the said post route numbered 38113, a subcontract and agreement between the said John W. Dorsey and Stephen W. Dorsey to carry and convey the said mail on and over the said post route.

And so on to the end of the paragraph. Then the next paragraph is:

And afterwards, to wit, on the 8th day of March, in the year of our Lord, 1881, * * * the said Thomas J. Brady did fraudulently make, sign, and file—

Connecting itself with the allegations in the paragraph first read:

And that thereupon, and in further pursuance of, and further to effect the object of their said unlawful, fraudulent, and malicious combination, confederacy, conspiracy, and agreement, as aforesaid—

These things were done upon that route. And then, in another paragraph:

And that thereupon, and in further pursuance of, and further to effect the object of their said unlawful, fraudulent, and malicious combination—

These other acts were done, including the orders mentioned on that page.

The COURT. The conspiracy must be brought within the period.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, of course.

The COURT. There must be shown to have been a subsisting conspiracy substantially as set out in the indictment after the 20th of May, 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

The COURT. And that any overt act in furtherance of that conspiracy, or in pursuance of the conspiracy, as I understand the language of that act, must be an act in its operation and effect done by one of the parties subsequent to the 20th of May, 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly. Then on page 28 is an act done—

The COURT. [Interposing.] Let me add one further remark, because I throw this out so that I may be enlightened before I say what I have to say to the jury. I observe in the indictment that various subcontracts are set out in the indictment as having been made and entered into in pursuance and in furtherance of the conspiracy. Suppose there be any other act done in furtherance of the conspiracy, would it be possible to sustain a conviction under this indictment upon such an overt act as that, that is, upon a subcontract? The conspiracy is to defraud the United States. An overt act in furtherance of a conspiracy to defraud the United States, it seems to me, ought to be an act which would have some tendency that way. Now, the fact that you have set out the existence of a subcontract in furtherance of the conspiracy, if there is nothing better as an overt act than that, I think I should say to the jury that that would not be sufficient. But still I would like to hear from the prosecution on that subject.

Mr. MERRICK. The subcontracts as overt acts did not figure very largely in the last trial.

The COURT. They figured in the indictment.

Mr. MERRICK. They are put in the indictment.

Mr. WILSON. They do not figure as to the merits of this case.

Mr. BLISS. There is one way, sir, in which the filing of subcontracts does result in an injury to the Government, and yet I am not prepared to say that it results in defrauding the United States in a way to come within this statute. I merely state to your honor now what comes up as a practical question in some civil proceedings. If the Government seeks to recover back the moneys obtained from it by the act of the contractor, the act of filing the subcontract for the whole amount, it being in pursuance of an agreement between the contractor and the subcontractor, and being intended simply as a cover, that does certainly throw obstacle in the way of the Government, though, as I have said before, I will not undertake to say that it inflicts a fraud upon the Government. If, for instance, a man's hostler becomes subcontractor, and he then at once turns around and files his subcontract in pursuance of the agreement with his principal, and the money is paid, under the statute there is a possibility of recovering it of the contractor, while there cannot be a possibility of recovering it of the subcontractor, to whom the contractor passed it over in pursuance of an agreement. I merely mention that as one way, I confess, that occurs to me where filing subcontracts would work to the disadvantage of the Government, and I mention that only because it is a matter that has come up in practical administration in connection with these investigations.

The COURT. We have had no evidence on that subject.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir. You asked me whether there could be a suggestion made of any way in which the filing of a subcontract could be a fraud upon the Government. I merely suggest that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It would not be a fraud. It would be an inconvenience, but anything on earth may operate that way.

The COURT. If there is a good bond, it would be no inconvenience, either.

Mr. WILSON. That is the reason why it cannot operate as a fraud, because the Government has taken its security and has its remedy on the bond.

The COURT. The fact that the subcontractor was a hostler is not a fact which would necessarily tend to produce a fraud against the Government.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir. I merely called attention to the fact that the use of the subcontract practically, in that way, in fact, might be an injury to the Government.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not see that it could.

The COURT. The Government loses a good deal of money in one way or another, as everybody must who deals largely in money matters, and yet without any crime.

There is some advantage now to a court in instructing a jury where there are prayers, no matter how numerous they be. Different propositions are probably repeated a half dozen times, and it gives the court the opportunity of instructing the jury half a dozen times over upon the same matter; and that may be necessary sometimes to make the jury understand what the court is charging. As we have a little spare time now, of course I am not disposed to withhold anything that it would probably be expedient to say. There was a case tried before me, holding the circuit court in this place some two years ago, in which I think the Fifth Baptist Church was the plaintiff, and the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company was the defendant. In that case the plaintiff claimed damages sustained by them as a congregation, in consequence of the railroad company having constructed its side-tracks near the church, in a lot, and they were in the habit of blowing off their ashes, steam, and smoke into the windows of the church, on Sundays and other days when the people were going to church and the children were going to Sunday school. The locomotives were backing in and out in a way that nobody can understand; at least, I never could understand why they do it so much. That was their habit.

Mr. WILSON. That was the way the engines rested, perhaps.

The COURT. The church brought suit against the railroad company in consequence of the damage to their building. That case was tried two or three times; the last time it was tried by me. The jury had not been able to agree upon former trials. Well, a good many instructions were presented upon both sides, and I adopted this course, and it appears to me now that it is as good a course, probably, for a judge to adopt as any other: To take up the prayers and make them the subject of a charge, at the end of each prayer applying the prayer practically to the facts of the case; not dealing with the prayers as abstractions of law, but making a practical use of them in connection with the facts in the case. That case went to the Supreme Court, and has recently been affirmed. I have seen a copy of the opinion of the Supreme Court in which they give what they call the charge of the court in answer to each prayer, and it seemed to me to operate well in that case, and the Supreme Court seemed to have so regarded it. I feel a little inclined to adopt that course here.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It seems to me, your honor, that there are not more than fifteen, I would say, propositions of law at the outside, if that many. I cannot see the use of passing upon each particular prayer. The prayers were offered by different counsel, and that will account for the fact that frequently four or five prayers represent the same principle of law.

The COURT. When I see that the jury understand my instructions I shall not repeat them any further.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It will take a very long time to go over the one hundred prayers.

Mr. MERRICK. As the prayers have not been argued, there may be some serpent lying hidden in the grass, which your honor will discover when you come to shake it. They do not want to shake the grass now.

Mr. DAVIDGE. They would have found it out before this.

Mr. MERRICK. We have not seen some of them.

The COURT. The whole course of the trial must have developed the points of the defense to a great extent.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We will go over the prayers, and those that are duplicated we will mark.

Mr. MERRICK. If they will withdraw those that are duplicates, it will abridge your honor's work very much.

The COURT. I do not know that it will.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Ker has now come in, and I would like to have him state to the court his view upon the question raised by the court, although I think Mr. Merrick has substantially covered the ground.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. KER. On page 27 the overt acts begin.

The COURT. The conspiracy begins at page 15.

Mr. KER. After the charging part in the indictment, setting out the means of the conspiracy and the object, it comes to the overt acts upon page 27:

And that thereupon, and in pursuance of, and to effect the object of their unlawful, fraudulent, and malicious combination—

There is a direct statement of what was done in pursuance of and to effect the object of the conspiracy. Then it goes on to state—did fraudulently file, and cause and procure to be filed, * * * a subcontract.

* * * And afterwards, to wit, on the 8th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1881—

And then it sets out the order by Brady. Then it goes on to page 29.

The COURT. How does it set out that order? What does it say in regard to that order?

Mr. KER. In the body of the charging part of the indictment it says, that all those orders were made upon the basis of the number of men and animals sworn to in the affidavit. In stating the overt acts upon a route, it says upon route 38113 :

And that thereupon, and in further pursuance of, and further to effect the object of their said * * * conspiracy—

They first filed a subcontract, and afterwards, on a given day, Brady made the order of increase and expedition on the said route. Then going on again:

And that thereupon, and in further pursuance of, and further to effect the object of their said * * * conspiracy, on the 10th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1879, * * * on said post route No. 34149, a certain unlawful, false, willful, and corrupt oath.

And afterwards, to wit, on the said 10th day of July, in the said year of our Lord 1879, * * * Brady did fraudulently make and file, and cause to be made and filed, in the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, a certain order in writing for increased and additional service, in carrying and transporting the said mails on and over the said post route numbered 34149.

And then it sets out:

And that thereupon, and in further pursuance of, and further to effect the object of their said unlawful * * * conspiracy—

On route 35015 an order was made for increase and expedition. Then again, on page 37:

And that thereupon, and in further pursuance of, and further to effect the object of—

The conspiracy there were on route 38134 false and fraudulent petitions filed. And afterwards, on the 8th day of July, there was a fraudulent affidavit filed. And afterwards, on the 8th day of July, there was an order for increase and expedition.

The point is, are you bound always to say when you set out the acts that they were done in pursuance of the conspiracy; to reiterate that at every stage and turn? Here are routes designated by numbers, referring back to "said route," stating that it was done on that particular route.

And that thereupon, and in further pursuance of, and to effect the object of the conspiracy—

On the route mentioned there were certain acts done by the different people mentioned in the indictment. Your honor by looking at them will see that each one charges the same. On page 73:

And that thereupon, and in further pursuance of, and further to effect the object of their said unlawful, fraudulent, and malicious combination, confederacy, conspiracy, and agreement, as aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, on the 18th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1879—

On route 34149 there was a fraudulent claim for pay for the third quarter up to the 30th day of September, 1879, by reason of the false order. It sets out a claim in the same way, treating that as an overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy and to effect the object of the conspiracy. I do not think, if I took all day, I could make it any plainer. Each paragraph mentions that the act was done in pursuance of the conspiracy. Suppose it was set out as one of the means to effect the object of the conspiracy that one man went to one place and afterwards another man to another place, is there any necessity to state that one man went to one place and afterwards the other man went to another place all the way through, when each route is dealt with by itself, and it is set out in the charge in the indictment that these orders were to be passed upon fraudulent oaths? You have to take the allegation of the overt act. You have to take the context to get it. Otherwise you would have had a multiplicity of charges of the same sort, a multiplicity of allegations that would have given no effect to the indictment or to the charge. All your honor has to do is to read the different paragraphs where it is set out that it was done in pursuance and to effect the object of the conspiracy.

The COURT. But when you come to set out Brady's order you describe it as an order he made on a certain date and that he made it fraudulently. Do you think Brady's intention attached to some other act is to be carried forward into that?

Mr. MERRICK. It goes all the way through it.

Mr. BLISS. That is the idea. The allegation that it was done in pursuance of the conspiracy commences each allegation and follows right along for each route.

The COURT. I understand that.

Mr. BLISS. I will hand your honor that opinion in the case of the United States vs. Britton and Bates.

The COURT. There is some peculiar language in that opinion about the locus penitentie.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor will see that the language is essential to the correctness of that opinion. It is not mere obiter, and I may say that it is entitled to the more weight because it is an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Woods' and differs from an opinion of Justice Woods as circuit judge in Alabama.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Do you think that adds much weight to the decision?

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; nothing can add weight to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Except being right.

Mr. WILSON. They decided in that case a very important principle.

Mr. BLISS. We will not go into an argument of it.

Mr. MERRICK. If they want to, let them go.

The COURT. If I have time I will look at it.

Mr. WILSON. You will find it takes the life out of this indictment.

Mr. MERRICK. Does it, indeed ?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, every bit of it. There is not a bit of blood left in the indictment.

Mr. BLISS. In that case the question was whether a certain thing was an offense against the United States. Here the question is whether the United States has been defrauded.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We will not argue it.

Mr. MERRICK. Of course you don't want to argue it. We are perfectly willing you should.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

TUESDAY, JUNE 12, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

CHARGE OF THE COURT TO THE JURY.

The COURT. Gentlemen of the jury, the patient and intelligent attention which you have given to the evidence in this case, to the discussions which have incidentally arisen through all these months, and to the powerful addresses which have been made to you by the counsel on both sides, have lightened to a great extent the duty of the court. I feel that it would be an unnecessary and it might be a dangerous undertaking on the part of the court to begin with the history of this case as it has been read out before you from the beginning to this day and attempt to go over all the ground and compare and collate the evidence one part with another for the purpose of assisting your minds in reaching a proper verdict. The arguments of counsel have superseded any necessity of that kind. All that could be presented has been presented, and the first ability in the land on both sides has been exerted in that very department. You have listened to the arguments attentively. You have heard the evidence yourselves. You have seen the witnesses before you. You have had all the means that any jury could require to make up a sensible and an honest opinion in regard to the issues involved.

It is proper, however, that the court should call your attention to some points in the case, and probably at more length than your patience will bear with comfortably. I wish to assist you in every way in my power without at all trespassing upon your domain, but simply by way of advice and counsel, first in regard to the questions of law to which I may advert, and which are involved in the case, and to which attention has been called by the prayers of counsel on both sides, and then to some features of the evidence possibly. In the first place, I think I ought to say to you that you are to decide this case according to the evidence. That is the solemn obligation which each of you has taken upon his own soul. You are not to allow yourselves for a moment to be swayed or influenced by any other considerations under heaven than the law and the evidence in the case. What has a jury to do with the demands of the popular mind, with articles in newspapers, and with appeals to you that the country expects a conviction at your hands ? These are things that ought never to come inside of these precincts. Thus far the waves may come, but a jury which does its duty should say they shall come no farther. I can scarcely imagine a more sublime spectacle than a jury organized under the laws of the country, sworn to try a case according to the evidence, and performing that duty manfully and conscientiously according to their own convictions and in defiance of popular clamor. Let popular clamor have its sway in its own sphere. Let it go into politics. There it has its appropriate field. Popular influence and public clamor and all influences of that kind should be excluded from the court-room.

On the other hand, appeals to your sympathies for the defendants on account of their social relations or other relations in life, and the effect which your verdict if against them might have upon others connected with them and near and dear to them should have no weight whatever with you. Appeals of this character on the one side and on the other, in important cases, are always made for the purpose of reaching the hearts and the weakness and the tenderness of the jury. They ought to have no consideration at all. The mercy of the law is in the law itself. The administration of criminal justice is based upon principles which make it, I may say, impossible for an innocent man to be convicted, in this country certainly. The law presumes every man to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. There is the mercy of the law. There is the protection to wives and children. There is an ample shield for the innocent. None other ought to be protected in a court of justice. When courts of justice become the mere instruments of popular clamor, or merely sham tribunals for the trial of crimes, it will be a bad day for the country. Let everything else drift as it may at loose ends and be carried away by passions, emotions, clamor, and prejudice, but as long as the administration of justice is preserved in its purity and in its integrity in the courts the country is safe. Without that the country must go to destruction. The rights of no people, the institutions of no people, can be protected except in the courts of justice.

I may say something else here. The law is supreme. The law must be obeyed. When violated, its penalties must be enforced. The policy of the law is to be found in the law itself. No public minister, no public officer of any description has any right to set up his own policy against the policy of the law. Such an officer occupies a place of trust, often a trust of the greatest magnitude. The interests of the people of the whole country are committed to his hands. He is an officer of the law and the law should be his guide. It is his duty to obey the law and not set up his own policy against the policy of the law under any circumstances whatever. To allow that would lead to great and innumerable abuses as you all must see. We will all move along smoothly and the country will prosper and thrive best when every man in his place performs his duty as a good citizen in obedience to the law. It is very true that occasionally an emergency may arise which will justify a public officer in departing from the law and casting himself for indemnity upon the legislature afterwards; but those are cases of emergency, such as sudden invasion of the country, calamity by conflagration, or destruction of property by inundation. For a regular policy which is to guide a department of the Government it is not to be allowed at all that a public officer shall set up his own policy against the law. That is a question that may arise here. Still I may say as applicable to the many points in this case that a mere violation of public duty on the part of an officer is not necessarily criminal. He may mistake his duty. He may think that he has the right and that he will promote the public good by departing from the law and following his own ideas. If he does so he violates the law it is certain; but unless his motives be criminal or corrupt he may not be amenable as a criminal.

These remarks are pointed, as is perfectly obvious to you all, to the position of General Brady and to the claims set up by him as I understood them in his testimony. For example, when the law directs that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in allowing increase of service or expedition shall have regard to the productiveness of a route and other circumstances, I do not think myself that it is a fair and reasonable construction of the law on his part to say, as he did undoubtedly on the stand in regard to these star routes in all the Western country, that it was not his habit to pay any attention to productiveness; that his doctrine was that the mail should reach every settlement in the country daily and expeditiously, however remote the settlement might be or however small. That is the doctrine, I understand, of a present member of the Cabinet who was a witness in this case. Sitting here and trying this case, I cannot recognize any such law as that or any such right as that. Still I do not say, and it is not my place to say, that the defendant, General Brady, in following out his policy and the policy of Mr. Teller in regard to this subject, acted from corrupt motives. That is a question for you to determine under all the evidence in the case.

There is another remark which I may add in this connection. The law prohibits, under penalty, I believe, but certainly prohibits, any public officer from expending money beyond the appropriations placed in his hands, or from making contracts for the expenditure of money beyond the appropriations. In the management of these star routes you have the undeniable evidence—it is documentary evidence and not disputed—that after Congress had appropriated for the use of these star routes in 1878—I believe that was the year—all the money which the Post-Office Department demanded or asked for that fiscal year from the 1st of July, 1879, to the 1st of July, 1880, in December, five months after the fiscal year had begun, to such an extent had these orders for increase of service and expedition and these large allowances been carried by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that a deficiency was manifest as close at hand, and an appeal had to be made to Congress for the purpose of meeting the deficiency. An act was passed with such guards on the subject as Congress thought fit to set up to prevent any future departure or violation of the law of that kind. It is possible all that might have been done merely from a mistaken sense of duty or from an exaggerated sense of regard for the public good. Men get into positions in which they think they are magnified. They often become enthusiasts in their departments, and go on recklessly in their enthusiasm, regardless of law and almost all other considerations, but carried forward by a kind of official fanaticism for their own branch of the service. If that happens, and there is no corrupt motive, no criminal purpose, but the orders have been made honestly, although from a mistaken sense of duty, the act is not criminal in itself.

Now, we will come a little closer to some of the prominent features of this case. The indictment itself charges a conspiracy. I will turn to section 5440. The indictment is framed under this section of the law:

If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars and not more than ten thousand dollars and to imprisonment not more than two years.

This statute was passed the 2d of March, 1867. It was changed by the act of the 17th of May, 1879, merely as to the punishment. As to all the rest it is word for word. This is a statutory definition of the crime that you are engaged in trying. It makes no matter what the books may say about other crimes or analogous crimes, conspiracies, or definitions of conspiracies. Here is the definition of the crime that you are trying. That is, that two or more persons must conspire together. Let us see what that means. Almost everybody knows what is meant generally by conspiring together. There must be some intelligence between the parties. They must have unison of mind. They must have a common purpose. A man may be useful to a conspiracy who is not in the conspiracy at all. He may be doing something to forward the conspiracy and yet he may be no part of the conspiracy, because he may not have been taken into the counsels of the parties who conspired. They may assign him certain things to do and although he may do what he is told to do by the others, yet if he is not in the conspiracy and has not come into intelligent communication with the others, he is not one of the conspirators, although he may have done something to forward the conspiracy. It occurs to me that this very case shows an illustration of what I mean. Peck, for example, is one of the defendants who was originally charged. He is dead now. He may have been one of these willing and intelligent conspirators. He certainly did many things originally to help them along in their common purpose; but I could imagine and I could account for his conduct without necessarily coming to the conclusion that he was one of the conspirators. He was not here at the time this conspiracy was organized if it was organized. His bids seem to have been put in by others in his name. He seems to have had no participation in the getting up of the bids, in putting the bids in, in finding the securities or in carrying the contracts into execution afterwards. His part seemed to consist in making affidavits. He made enough of them; but still it is possible that he might not have had any participation in the conspiracy at all. It is possible he might have made those affidavits, since the contracts were given out to him nominally, to the best of his knowledge and belief on the representations of others, and yet not have been a member of the conspiracy in a criminal sense. But I speak of him now because he is out of the way, he is dead, and we have had no investigation of his connection with the case. If he had been on trial, the aspect of the facts might have been changed. But I speak now of him as he appears in this business, merely for illustration, that a man may, by his own acts, do certain things, the effect of which will forward the objects of the conspiracy without himself having been a conspirator. It requires intelligence and understanding on the part of the conspirators, a combination of views and a unity of purpose, and those must be of a criminal kind. I need not go into any further discussion of that subject here than such discussion as will be practical in this case. The law-books say that a conspiracy may be to do a lawful thing by unlawful means, or an unlawful thing by lawful means. But we need not trouble ourselves about that. The conspiracy here is charged in the indictment to be a combination of intelligent beings with a unity of purpose, a common purpose, to defraud the United States by means of false affidavits furnished by the contractors to the department, and of fraudulent orders on the part of Brady. That is the practical conspiracy that we have to examine here.

Now, there is another thing I wish to say something about, and that is the statute of limitations. The statute of limitation covers with its protection all crimes that were perpetrated more than three years prior to the finding of the indictment. Whatever may have been the crime—at least this crime, if any—these defendants are not liable to trial for, or to be punished on account of, anything except what they did as conspirators within three years from the finding of the indictment. The indictment was delivered in court on the 20th of May, 1882. You cannot find a verdict of guilty against any of these defendants for anything they have done of a criminal character, described in this indictment, prior to the 20th of May, 1879, because from the 20th of May, 1879, to the 20th of May 1882, covers a space of three years. If they are convicted you will have to convict them for what they did within the three years immediately behind the finding of the indictment. You may probably wonder, then, why the court has allowed so much time to be spent in receiving evidence of acts done by these several defendants long prior to the 20th of May, 1879. If they are not to be punished except for what they have done since the 20th of May, 1879, why investigate what they did prior to that time? That is one of the mysteries of the law, and when it is explained the principle will commend itself to the conception of every fair-minded man, whether lawyer or layman.

A conspiracy is never, or hardly ever, arranged or organized in the light—and I say hardly ever, because some political conspiracies may be exceptions. A political conspiracy often takes place under the skies, before the world. But other conspiracies, conspiracies to commit fraud and get money unfairly, are arranged in the darkness, in retirement, not publicly. It is not necessary, either, that the members of such conspiracy shall be all together at the same time. They may become members of the conspiracy through correspondence or through verbal communication. They may become members after the thing originated, from time to time. That necessarily makes it difficult to ascertain the facts. The facts can only be learned through circumstances and through the several acts of the parties themselves at different times and in different places; and after exhausting inquiry in hearing these subjects, finding out all the circumstances, the jury must infer from the evidence before them whether the evidence leads to no other fair conclusion than that of conspiracy between the parties.

It is not a chain. I heard some argument during the trial in regard to the chain of circumstantial evidence. It was said that the strength of the chain was to be measured by the weakness of the links, and if there was a failure in one circumstance the case broke down. That is not an illustration to throw light upon the question at all. It is an illustration which is calculated to mislead the mind. And that is the fault of a great many metaphors, and, in fact, most of them. They are mere delusions. An iron chain, of course, is no stronger than its weakest link; that is very true. And there may be circumstances so linked together that they may be compared to the links of a chain, one connected with another in a certain line of evidence, one fact depending on another. That sometimes is the case in the trial of causes. But where you have a multitude of facts, and all the circumstances pointing in one direction, they are more like the vanes upon the public buildings of a city. If you see all these vanes turning to one point, you know how the wind blows. If there happens to be one of those vanes too rusty or old or out of repair not to turn, that does not affect the indications of the others. There may be certain facts in a case which do not point the same way as the other facts. That may arise from the defect of proof or from want of knowledge in regard to those facts. But if there be enough of facts all pointing in one direction, not in a chain, you may look in that direction for the indication of what they mean. If there be other facts in the case that do not point that way, but point in a different way, then it is for you to consider and decide whether these prevailing indications, these general indications, establish in your own mind such evidence of conspiracy that there can be no doubt of the fact.

There is another thing. No man was ever convicted except by his own acts; he must be convicted by his own conduct. Nobody else has a right to bring him into difficulty. I shall have something further to say on that point after a while.

Before I proceed to consider the prayers, there is another question which was presented yesterday for the first time, and which arises upon the face of the indictment. However, I will lay that aside for a moment, too. I have not yet finished what I was going to say in regard to the formation of the conspiracy anterior to the 20th of May, 1879.

In 1877 the department advertised for bids for service on a large number of what are called star routes. After that advertisement came out, Mr. S. W. Dorsey, who was then a Senator of the United States, residing in this city, according to the evidence seemed to feel an interest in the subject, and his brother, John W. Dorsey, felt an interest in it; and there is some evidence of what Mr. Peck, his brother-in-law, said in regard to putting in bids. John W. Dorsey and Peck were absent, and it was necessary that somebody should be here before bids were to be put in, to make arrangements. As I recollect the evidence, upon the suggestion of a letter of John W. Dorsey, his brother, the Senator, undertook to supervise the subject, and called in the assistance of Mr. Boone in the first instance. Boone rendered a good deal of assistance in correspondence and making preparations. Peck was not here at all. John W. Dorsey came on late in the fall, but all these arrangements were made before he came, made certainly under the inspection and general superintendence of Senator Dorsey, and at his house; the parties often met there; there was their office. Preparations were made to put in bids, and correspondence was carried on. He was active in procuring bonds, and in fact seemed, according to my construction of the evidence—you may judge of that—to exert a controlling influence over everybody within his sphere on that subject, correcting their estimates, changing their proposed bids. He was, of course, incompetent to become a contractor. The bids were put in in March, 1878, after all these arrangements had been carried on under Senator Dorsey's eyes and under his instructions. Miner had been brought on here. Miner put in bids; Peck put in bids; John W. Dorsey put in bids; and those were the three who did put in bids. Vaile was not then in the concern, or connected with it. At the letting in March, 1878, about one hundred and thirty contracts were awarded to those three men, and if the evidence is to be accredited, those three men, though bidding separately, were mutually interested in their several bids. I understand that to be the evidence upon that point. Of course you are to judge of it for yourselves. Here was a unity of purpose and of interest on the part of these three men to whom the contracts were awarded. Now, Senator Dorsey, as I said, was not one of the bidders, and could not be, although he seemed, according to the evidence, to be the most active man in making all the preparations that were necessary for putting in the bids, and afterwards in carrying out the contracts for the time.

It is objected that he, of course, was outside, and could not bid. But it makes no matter, so far as that combination is concerned, whether he had an interest in those contracts or not. If he chose to enter actively into those arrangements with those persons, and if he had a sinister or unlawful view, as they had, in getting up their combination in that way, he was just as guilty without a contract as with it. His guilt or innocence does not depend upon whether he had a contract or an interest in a contract. If they were engaged in an unlawful conspiracy, and he assisted in it, then whether he assisted from love of his brother and affection for his brother-in-law, and was entirely disinterested, or whether he engaged in it for interested purposes, is a matter of no consequence at all. The question is what he did, and not why did he assist them.

Well, all these arrangements were made, and the awards were given out in March, 1878, and these three men, John W. Dorsey, Peck, and Miner, became the contractors, with this mutual interest. That thing ran along, and there was likely to be a failure on many routes, and, to prevent an entire failure along the whole line of routes, Vaile, who was a capitalist, was brought in, and from the fall of 1878 Vaile became a partner with those gentlemen in carrying on their routes.

Now you have the evidence as to what those gentlemen did—Vaile and Miner, Peck and John W. Dorsey, and S. W. Dorsey—during that period. It is claimed by the prosecution that the evidence shows that this was a criminal combination in its inception, and we went back to that period for the purpose of ascertaining the character of the original agreement between those parties, what was the arrangement between them, for what purpose they combined. Did they combine for an honest purpose, or did they combine, with their interest in this way, with a view to obtain afterwards, by means of fraud and those devices described in the indictment, allowances for increase of service and increase of speed upon the routes contrary to law and contrary to honest purposes? If that was a fraudulent combination, if you are satisfied that Vaile and these men were carrying it on fraudulently at this time, then you have established the character of their combination behind the statute of limitations.

Then we advance down to March, 1879. Mr. S. W. Dorsey comes out of the Senate on the 4th of March, 1879. On that very day he writes a decisive note to the department, in which he assails some papers that Vaile claimed gave him priority over Dorsey upon those routes in the way of a lien. Vaile came here on the 6th, and then a new distribution of the routes was made. S. W. Dorsey comes forward then and John W. Dorsey and Peck step out. You are to judge what that indicates. Whether it was merely carrying out, when there was no longer any obstacle, what was the real substance of the arrangement before; whether Peck and John W. Dorsey were mere men of straw in regard to these contracts and S. W. Dorsey the substantial party, or whether at that time an entire new organization took place. S. W. Dorsey comes in and takes 30 per cent. of these contracts, Miner takes 30 per cent., and Vaile takes 40: that makes the 100. That takes the whole one hundred and thirty routes. So that from some time in the latter part of March, 1879, for any interest in the routes, Peck and John W. Dorsey are out. But some of the contracts were in their names, and expedition could not be obtained except by their affidavits, because the regulations of the department required that the affidavits for expedition should be made by the contractor. In that way it is that the Government claims that Peck and John W. Dorsey still remained in the combination; that they continued to make affidavits after this new arrangement. By the new arrangement, as I think all testified, it was agreed, as I have said, that Vaile should have 40 per cent. of the routes, although they stood in other men's names; that S. W. Dorsey should have 30 per cent. of them (although he had not a contract in his own name), and that Miner, who was one of the original contractors, should have 30 per cent. So that Dorsey and Vaile, neither of whom had a contract at all before, neither of whom was an original contractor, and both of whom were powerless to make affidavits succeeded to the rights of these other parties who had retired; and it was agreed all around that those going out should execute the necessary papers to carry on the business, and those who remained in should, between themselves, execute interchangeably any papers that were necessary to carry on the business. Upon those new parties coming in the old parties remained in the combination, for the purpose of carrying on the business, executing any papers that were deemed necessary to carry out the purpose of the combination, whether lawful or otherwise. If it was a lawful and honest agreement there was nothing improper in the arrangement; it was all right. Everything depends upon the purposes of the parties under the arrangement. If Peck and John W. Dorsey, who went out, knew that it was a combination to which they were parties, and that their purpose was to have fraudulent petitions gotten up and fraudulent orders made for increase of service and expedition upon their several routes, and they agreed to continue that same business, helping it along after they went out, for the benefit of those who succeeded them, then, if their purpose was criminal, I do not see how their going out at that time would release them from the charge.

And so as to those who came in. If they came in with this purpose, entered into these arrangements with a corrupt and fraudulent purpose as against the Government, it makes but little odds how the routes were distributed amongst themselves. It is the conspiracy which is the efficient element in this crime; and that conspiracy was not dependent upon the contracts. A party might remain in conspiracy after he had parted with his interest. It is very true that the indictment does allege that these parties were all interested in the contracts on the 23d of May. But that was a wholly superfluous and dangerous averment to make. But being surplusage it was not necessary to prove it, because it is the conspiracy that is the question, and not whether they had an interest or not in the subcontracts. The averment that they were all interested in the contracts had nothing to do necessarily with the conspiracy. They were not bound to prove that fact, and if they failed to prove it it was not fatal to the case.

John W. Dorsey and Peck went out. They had no contracts substantially. Except so far as the contracts stood in their names they had no interest in the contracts. But still they might have remained in the combination for the purpose of defrauding the Government, if that was the purpose of the combination. It all depends on that.

Then we have this arrangement made in March. It was not finally consummated till the 1st of April. Here is a new distribution. Still, we are outside the statute. We have not come within the statute yet. We received the evidence of them merely for the purpose of getting at the character of this partnership. Was it a legal partnership? Was it a legal combination between these parties, or was it a combination for the purpose of defrauding the Government? If it was the latter kind, for the purpose of defrauding the Government, then it was continued on in that way after the 1st of April, 1879.

That brings us on until the 20th of May. In order to sustain this indictment we must get this conspiracy on this side of the 20th of May. We must find it there, and we must find the overt acts, too, because the overt acts follow the conspiracy. If this combination fell to pieces between the 1st of April and the 20th of May we have no evidence of that fact. The combination, whatever it was, that was consummated between the parties on the 1st of April continued along according to its terms. If it was an unlawful combination, we have no evidence that it was broken up between the 1st of April and the 20th of May, and the presumption would be, in the absence of any proof of its dissolution, that it continued after the 20th of May. Certainly it is a presumption which the jury would have a right to draw, in the absence of proof that any other arrangement was made between the 1st of April and the 20th of May. The jury would certainly have a right to presume that the new organization continued on within the period of the statute of limitations.

Now we have so far brought the conspiracy within the period of the statute of limitations, if it was a conspiracy. If it was an honest arrangement, then you need not trouble yourselves, gentlemen of the jury, about dates of organizations or anything of the sort. If the parties all meant well and fairly, and there was no purpose to defraud the Government, these things are all lost and amount to nothing, and the parties are entitled to acquittal. But if it was otherwise, you have a right to judge of the character of the association since the 20th of May, from the antecedent history to which I have called your attention.

But it is not enough that there should be a conspiracy. The law requires that the conspiracy should be a subsisting conspiracy, and that within three years before the finding of the indictment; and besides that, that some one or more of the conspirators should have done some act in furtherance of the object of the conspiracy. The conspiracy itself is not enough; that act must be shown to have been done since the 20th of May, 1879, because nothing can be done in pursuance of some other thing until that other thing has first existed. Some difficulty comes up there. I may say that most—yes, much the larger part—of the petitions that have been denounced as fraudulent, and some of which look very much of that kind on their face, were gotten up before the 20th of May, 1879. For example, on route 34149 there is a petition charged to be false, and it is charged to have been filed on the 10th of July, 1879; that would be within the period of the statute, as an overt act. In fact it was not filed on the 10th of July, 1879, but it was filed on the 3d of April, 1879. The petition, therefore, which was filed on the 3d of April, 1879, was, of course, filed prior to the 10th of July, 1879, and it was filed, in point of fact, behind the period of the statute of limitations. Still another question comes up—and that is the case with a great many of these petitions and with a great many of these affidavits. Some of these affidavits of Peck's were made eight or nine months, and, I believe, one of them nearly a year before the date of filing. Now we will consider this false petition as filed April 3, 1879; but it is charged to have been filed July 10, 1879. The petition was on file, but seems not to have been used. The question is whether one of these parties, interested in procuring an order for expedition and an increase of service, and using a petition already filed in order to procure his order, can be said to have filed that petition on the 10th of July, 1879. There is a section of the Revised Statutes which covers this very point, and which I have not time now to look up, though I have examined it before. I propose to leave it to the jury in this case to say whether any of these petitions or affidavits that were on file prior to the 20th of May, 1879, were used by any of these defendants in procuring expedition or increase of service after that date.

Mr. BLISS. After the 20th of May?

The COURT. After the 20th of May.

Although they had been filed before, if Vaile or Dorsey or any of the parties to this indictment in point of fact made use of a false affidavit or any false papers on file, knowing it to be of that character, for the purpose of procuring increase of service or increase of expedition, I shall hold that that use of the paper made it an act in pursuance of the conspiracy, if there was a conspiracy. You understand me, gentlemen. There were numerous affidavits filed in the department before the 20th of May, 1879, in regard to these routes and not acted upon. There were numerous petitions filed not acted upon. If they were made use of by any of these defendants after that time for the purpose of procuring these allowances for expedition or increase of service, then I hold that that was an act done in pursuance of the conspiracy, if there was a conspiracy.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it be proper for me to ask the court whether that would be so unless it is alleged in the indictment that they were used?

Mr. MERRICK. I think you had better let the court go on with its charge.

The COURT. The indictment charges that these orders were procured by means of false affidavits.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But when it comes to the overt act.

The COURT. As to the dates, the dates in an indictment are of but little consequence. The man who files the affidavit in the first place might escape by the lapse of time, because he had done that act of filing anterior to the period of the statute of limitations, when one of the others who succeeded him and made use of that paper, knowing it to be a false and fraudulent paper, would himself be liable as committing an overt act.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If there was an allegation.

The COURT. I regard the overt act which declares that the filing was done on a certain day by a certain party of a certain false paper or affidavit as meaning that the paper was presented on that day and used on that day by the party. That is my view as to the substantial charge of the indictment. It was the use of a false paper. The man who made the paper might be protected by the statute, and the others who used the paper knowing it to be a false paper would not be protected. As to all that the jury will have to judge.

Upon this route, 34149, the false petition was in fact filed the 3d of April, 1879. It is charged to have been filed on the 10th of July, 1879. That date in the indictment, like other dates in an indictment, is of no consequence. It is only material as to when it was used. On the same route the oath is charged to have been filed the 10th of July, 1879, when, in point of fact, it was filed the 3d of April, 1879.

On route 35015 the oath was charged to have been filed the 23d of May, 1879. That was within the period. In point of fact it was filed the 15th of May, 1879. So in the same case there are seven petitions all charged in the indictment to have been filed on the 10th of July, 1879. One of them was filed the 13th of May, 1879, behind the period of the statute, and four of them were filed on December 6, 1878. On two of them there is no date of filing marked.

On route 35051 the indictment charges that four certain petitions were filed the 2d of August, 1879. In fact they were filed the 10th of April, 1879, all behind the period of the statute.

On route 38134 the indictment charges that the petitions were filed on the 8th of July, 1879, when, in point of fact, they were filed the 22d of April, 1879, behind the statute. On the same route the indictment charges that the oath was filed July 8, 1879, when, in point of fact, it was filed the 8th of May, 1879. That was behind the statute.

On route 38135 the indictment charges that the oath was filed the 26th of June, 1879, when, in point of fact, it was filed the 18th of April, 1879. In the same case the petitions are charged to have been filed the 26th of June, 1879, when, in point of fact, one was filed the 17th of April, 1879, and the other four were filed the 8th of May, 1879, all behind the statute.

On route 38140 the petitions are charged to have been filed the 23d of May, 1879, within the period. In point of fact they seem to have been filed one on May 10, 1879, and the other in April, 1879. The oath in that case is charged to have been filed on the same day, May 23, 1879, but was filed the 30th of April, 1879.

On route 31156 the oath is charged to have been filed the 12th of June, 1879, within the period, when, in point of fact, it was filed the 6th of May, 1879.

On route 40104 there is a fraudulent subcontract charged. The indictment charges some of these subcontracts as fraudulent and entered into in pursuance of the conspiracy. I do not see how a subcontract can very well be fraudulent as to the Government. The subcontract was charged as filed the 23rd of July, 1879, when, in fact, it was filed the 8th of May, 1879. On the same route a false oath is charged to have been filed the 23d of July, 1879. That oath was, in fact, filed as far back as the 25th of December, 1878.

I believe that there is not a single instance in which any of these papers were, in point of fact, filed within the period of the statute.

Mr. BLISS. Does your honor mean these that you have enumerated, or others?

The COURT. These and others.

Mr. BLISS. The oath on route 41119 was clearly filed within the time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But the charge is not sufficient.

Mr. BLISS. I am not discussing that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The date is very good, but the charge is worse than the others.

Mr. BLISS. I think there are some others.

The COURT. It may be, but in the short time that I have had I have not been able to find them.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Ingersoll admitted that in his summing up.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I admitted it as to the date, but I insist that the charge in the indictment makes it bad.

The COURT. I will come to that point.

Mr. BLISS. I was going to ask your honor whether you noticed that the date on which the filing of all these papers is alleged to have taken place is the date upon which the order which we say was made, was made upon the papers.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. BLISS. Taking the filing as preceding the order on that day.

The COURT. No. They were charged to have been filed—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] On the date of the order.

Mr. BLISS. On the date of the order all the way through, being the date they were used. That is the claim we make.

The COURT. That is true. Under the ruling of the court then it was the use that was made of the paper, for the purpose of procuring the order, which fixes the time at which the paper was presented. So that a paper, although filed in point of fact and resting in the pigeon-holes of the department unused prior to the 20th of May, 1879, but used afterwards and since the period of the statute of limitation, would be an overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy within the period of the statute.

Mr. BLISS. The oath on route 44140 was also filed on the 24th day of May.

The COURT. I did not go over them all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That was on Sanderson's route.

Mr. BLISS. No.

The COURT. A question was made yesterday for the first time of this kind: The indictment up to page 27 is occupied with preliminary matter or with the setting out of the conspiracy. The charge of conspiracy begins on page 15 and goes on to page 27. Mr. Brady, one of the defendants, occupies a number of pages in the charging part of the conspiracy, but at page 27, at the foot of the page, commences the setting out of the several overt acts. I will read from the indictment, beginning there:

And that thereupon, and in pursuance of, and to effect the object of their unlawful, fraudulent, and malicious combination, confederacy, conspiracy, and agreement as aforesaid the said John W. Dorsey—and the others procured to be filed a subcontract. I do not think that is of any consequence. I think that a subcontract cannot be a fraudulent act done in pursuance of the conspiracy. The fraud must be got at in some other way than by a subcontract, and it must be manifested in some other way than by a subcontract. This subcontract was not of a fraudulent character; at least there is no allegation to show that it was. I am not disposed to treat these averments in regard to subcontracts as amounting to anything at all as overt acts. After charging that in pursuance of the conspiracy this subcontract was filed, another paragraph begins as follows:

And afterwards, to wit, on the eighth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, at the county and District aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the said court, the said Thomas J. Brady did fraudulently make, sign, and file in the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General a certain order in writing—

And so on. There Brady is charged with having made a fraudulent order. The first overt act charges John W. Dorsey, Montfort C. Rerdell, and Stephen W. Dorsey with an overt act done in pursuance of the conspiracy. That in form is all right, but the overt act is so trifling that I would not regard it. In point of form it is correct, for it charges that that thing was done in pursuance of and to effect the object of their unlawful conspiracy. But when it comes to charging Brady with making his fraudulent order it does not say that it was done in pursuance of the conspiracy. It says that it was a fraudulent order made on a certain day for the benefit, gain, and profit of the said John W. Dorsey and others—

As he, the said Thomas J. Brady, then and there well knew as aforesaid.

That refers to what is charged in the indictment in regard to the conspiracy. It is charged that Brady entered into the conspiracy with the others for the purpose of making orders of a fraudulent kind for expedition or increase of service on routes where he knew they were not needed, or, in the language of the indictment—

As he, the said Thomas J. Brady, then and there well knew as aforesaid.

"As aforesaid" refers to the conspiracy charged. Still I can hardly regard that as enough. It ought to have charged him with having made this fraudulent order in pursuance of and in furtherance of the object of the conspiracy. I have consulted forms of indictments since yesterday where an overt act is required, and I have consulted some authorities on the subject. They all require that the overt act must be set out as an overt act done in pursuance of the conspiracy. I apprehend that that defect, if it be one, is a defect in this indictment. I am not surprised at it, because the indictment must have cost the draughtsman a great deal of labor, and he must have gone over an immense amount of material in drawing it up calculated to confuse the mind. Undoubtedly he could not have been as well acquainted with the facts of the case then as he is now. But I am inclined to think that that difficulty is cured by section 1025, which is in these words:

No indictment found and presented by a grand jury in any district or circuit or other court of the United States shall be deemed insufficient, nor shall the trial, judgment, or other proceeding thereon be affected, by reason of any defect or any imperfection in matter of form only which shall not tend to the prejudice of the defendant.

If this was really anything else than a matter of form I should be obliged to sustain the objection. What is meant by matter of form only is explained by the last line of the law, which says:

Which shall not tend to the prejudice of the defendant.

Looking at this indictment I do not think that the omission in question would tend to the prejudice of the defendant. It is not a matter of substance. It is charged to have been a fraudulent order, and it is charged to have been the kind of order that Brady is charged to have conspired about, and, although I think it would have been much better to have declared and set out that it was an overt act done in pursuance of the conspiracy, yet I am satisfied that it would be cured by this statute.

There is another reason why the objection should not be sustained now. This indictment has gone through the fire. For more than a year it has been under almost constant fire. We have had demurrers, pleas in abatement, and all kinds of motions the ingenuity of able counsel could devise. But this defect has not been named in any of the demurrers so far as I remember. Now, a defect in an indictment is a subject of demurrer or it may be good reason for arrest of judgment, or it may be good ground for reversal; but I do not know that a question on the validity of any part of an indictment can be raised on an instruction asking the court to charge the jury in regard to it. When the court comes to charge the jury it is not passing upon the validity of the indictment. The business of the court is to advise the jury in regard to the conclusions of law arising on the evidence and matters in which they are concerned as judges of the evidence and the law ultimately. The jury are not judges of the validity of the indictment. The court therefore cannot be called upon to instruct the jury that there is one part of the indictment which they are trying which is invalid in the absence of a demurrer. This point cannot be raised, therefore, at this time, in my judgment.

The same defect, if I may call it so, pervades the whole indictment from page 27 up to its termination at page 89. Whenever a new route is taken up the indictment sets out properly:

And that thereupon, and in further pursuance of, and further to effect the object of their said unlawful, fraudulent, and malicious combination, confederacy—

And so on, the defendants procured certain fraudulent papers or petitions to be filed ; but when it comes to setting out Brady's act, the act of a different party, but still one of the defendants and a member of the conspiracy, it merely charges the act as fraudulent and not as an act done in pursuance of the conspiracy. The statute declares that there must be an overt act done by one or more of the defendants in pursuance of the conspiracy and undoubtedly that would be an objection to all these overt acts of Brady's but for this statute, provided it had been made at the proper time and place. That is my judgment. I shall hold therefore that this indictment is valid and that the overt acts are properly charged against Brady.

I have taken up so much of your time, gentlemen, in my own way and have laid aside the several prayers. I will now take up the prayers and see what I have omitted. I have substantially answered the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth prayers of the prosecution. On the sixth prayer I shall have a word to say, and I will read it to you :

SIXTH.

The law provides that compensation for additional service in carrying the mail shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service.

That is a true statement of the law in regard to increase of service. If the contract provides for carrying the mail once a week, and an increase of service is made to six times a week, the law provides that the compensation shall not exceed six times the original contract price.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The contract.

The COURT. The law. It makes no difference what the contract is if the law does not allow it. I may say here that in regard to all the contracts we have had before us, when increase of service has been made as far as I remember that increase of service has been a duplication or a triplication of the original service and a corresponding increase of the compensation. If it was a thousand dollars a year for one trip it was $6,000 for six trips.

Mr. BLISS. I think there are four orders, your honor, in which the amount for trips and expedition is not separated, so that we cannot distinguish them.

The COURT. I understand that ; but the law does prescribe that as a limit.

The law likewise provides that no extra allowance shall be made for any increase or expedition for carrying the mail, unless additional stock and carriers are thereby made necessary ; and in such case the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation under the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution ; and the stock and carriers necessarily employed in the execution of the original contract mean those then actually in service.

You understand the difference between increase of service, which is a mere increase in the number of trips, and increase in the expedition or time. There cannot be much fraud in increasing the service unless there is a willful throwing away of money. An officer might allow six trips a week out in the country where there was nothing but wild beasts. That would certainly be an abuse of his power. But if he chose to give out that contract, and the man performed the service under the contract, he would be entitled to his pay, unless there was some conspiracy to have it done. It is a very different thing in regard to expedition. Everything depends on the strength of the oath there. I may say that there never was a law more insufficiently guarded than this. It says :

Unless additional stock and carriers are thereby made necessary.

Then comes in the regulation of the department. That regulation gives the contractor an oath to take, and he swears that the number of men and animals now necessary is so many, and the number of men and animals on the projected increase of speed will be so many. I differ from counsel for the prosecution in regard to that oath. I do not think that the contractor is bound to state in his oath how many men and horses he now uses. I do not think that the regulation requires that. The question is, how many are necessary. I think it was well said by Mr. Ingersoll, in his argument on that point, that the Government would be in great danger of loss from any other interpretation. For example, if it was actually necessary to use ten men and ten horses upon a route on the existing service, and twenty men and horses on the projected expedited service, then the contractor would be entitled to double compensation. But if he was allowed to swear that he only had so many on the existing service, he would be tempted to run his service with five men and horses. For a little while the horses could stand it and the men could stand it. He would swear truly that the whole number he was using was five men and horses. He might swear truly that the number necessary on the expedited schedule was twenty men and horses. According to the construction claimed by the Government, he might make an oath with a good conscience which would increase his pay 400 per cent., or increase it 200 per cent., when in fact, if an affidavit was honestly made as to the number of men and horses actually necessary and proper to be used, the number on the existing schedule would be ten and the number on the expedited schedule would be twenty, and he would only get 100 per cent. of increase.

As I said before, on another occasion, this affidavit business is where all these frauds come in, if there are any. By the law there is no affidavit provided for at all. The law imposes the duty upon the Second Assistant of allowing the same proportion for the increased service as was allowed for the former service, having regard to the increased number of men and animals required. The law itself does not authorize an affidavit; but it seems from the evidence that a habit grew up in the department even before Brady's time of calling upon the contractor to make an affidavit. That was the practice to some extent, until at length, in 1879, it ripened into the regulation, which we have promulgated in the regulations of that year while General Brady was there, and that provided that the contractor should make an affidavit setting out how many men and horses are now necessary on the present schedule and how many would be required on the expedited schedule. It seems that such affidavit was generally taken to be correct. There are some instances in which the allowance was not made exactly in conformity with the affidavit, for example, on the Bismarck and Tongue River route. The affidavit for the increase of expedition called for one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty horses for the service. That was manifestly monstrous, and the Second Assistant did not allow it. He allowed liberal compensation, though, at the rate of about $37.65 a mile for the service. But the rule was an invitation to fraud. General Brady said that he regarded and treated his contractors as all honest men. He regarded their oaths as true. Of course he could not go out there and make his examinations personally. He had other means, however, but from the evidence we have had in this case I have been very strongly impressed with the freedom with which these contractors have made their affidavits and the liberality with which those affidavits have been made in regard to their own interests.

When it is known that a slight deviation from the truth, in an affidavit, may increase a contractor's profits by many thousands of dollars the temptation is too strong for the virtue of the most of men.

It is a very remarkable thing, too, it appears to me, in regard to these affidavits that the affidavits show that the present expedition was always with a very meager force. It is wonderful how astute men become in the discovery of contrivances for their own interests. None of these contractors failed to find that out. For example, a service which at present requires ten men and horses, and on the projected increase of speed would really require twenty men and horses, if the contractor will swear that at present he requires only five men and horses he need not stretch his conscience at all at the other end; he may swear now at this time that instead of ten being necessary, only five are necessary, and that twenty men and horses are necessary for the increased service, and thus, as I said before, he increases his compensation by 300 per cent. just by the change from ten to five. If he should swear the first figure down to two he would increase his compensation by 900 per cent. It is like the movement of a rod on an angle. A very small deviation from the point of the angle will make a very wide difference at the end of the rod. It was the contractor's interest all the time to swear down the present number, and then if he could stretch it a little at the other end, it was easy to make it very remunerative. It seems to me that this was a regulation that needed to be watched with great vigilance practically, and that the contractor ought not to be allowed to come into the office and say, "I have got Senator So-and-so to recommend an increase of service and expedition, and here is my affidavit as to the men and horses," and get the order before leaving the office. There was a check upon that in Mr. Brady's rule. He said he had a general rule. But it is a dangerous custom. It invites fraud. It encourages perjury. It is a system upon which no private man would conduct his own affairs. What would be the consequence if there should be a delay in expediting one of these routes? What hurry was there for the mail to cross from Bismarck to Tongue River through an uninhabited waste for three hundred miles to accommodate a soldier post, and to be traveled night and day? There was enough demand to give them a daily mail if they wanted it. General Miles said, when he complained once, that they had not had a mail for thirty days. Men who were in the habit of getting information only once in thirty days would be perfectly satisfied I should think if they got it each day. When expedited it required the mail carriers to travel night and day for three hundred miles through a waste of country between such a place as Bismarck and such another place as Tongue River and Fort Keogh, a military post. There was a still more remarkable case in my opinion on the Mineral Park and Pioche route, and there was another route, of which I have forgotten the name, on which, during a great portion of the winter the carriers had to travel on snow-shoes, and they had to follow the streams up around to their heads. There were no bridges.

Mr. BLISS. You mean the Bridge Creek route, I suppose.

The COURT. I think so. Certainly it is the duty of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to know something about the orders he was making. Certainly he ought to have enough regard for the duties that he owed to the public to guard his office from unnecessary extravagance and waste. Why should expedition be granted to such an extent as to require the mail carriers to travel night and day through regions of country unsettled and uninhabited, where, when there was a flood, the streams of those mountains obliged them to go around their heads before they could get across, and to do that day and night? The subcontractor was bound to perform the service under penalty of being fined. That was a kind of administration that shocked my sense of propriety and prudence and good judgment and fidelity to the public Treasury. Still, as I said before, men become enthusiasts in their business and go wild and sometimes honestly become extravagant, extravagant to a degree that every sane man would pronounce extravagant, but led off by one idea. If that was the case here, all that would not be criminality. Certainly General Brady regarded himself as in some way not only the successor but the rival administrator of his branch of the Government to what had preceded, and was called the Jewellian policy. The Jewellian policy, as General Brady describes it, was a policy which expended the money of the Government mainly upon the railroads of the country and not upon these remote settlements. His was one of the other kind. I do not think that General Brady did exact justice to Mr. Jewell in that description. Although it is not in evidence here, yet I will take the liberty of saying that the Jewellian policy as I understood it myself at the time was a policy which brought the expenses of the department as near as possible within its resources, a policy of economy in all points and extravagance nowhere and unnecessary service nowhere. That was the Jewellian policy as I understood it, and as I had it from Mr. Jewell himself. At any rate whether it was Jewellian or not it seems to me that was the proper policy.

There was an argument made about the petitions of the people. General Brady says he paid no attention to these petitions, or very little, and I dare say he did not. If the petitions were fraudulent he probably did not know it. I am not disposed to charge him with knowledge of the fraudulent character of those petitions. It is charged in the indictment that one object of the conspiracy was to get up these petitions as a pretext upon which to found these orders. If that was so, and if he was in that conspiracy, then he is chargable with the character of the petitions, whatever they were, because he entered into a conspiracy to get them up. Whether he looked at them or not, they were gotten up in pursuance of the conspiracy in such a case.

In such a case as that, where the officer was already in the conspiracy (if you should be fully satisfied on that question), neither the petitions, the affidavits, or the recommendations made by members of Congress, all or any of them, are worthy of much consideration by you.

As to recommendations given by members of Congress on behalf of expenditures of public money in their respective districts, and amongst those who, in patronizing phrase, are sometimes designated "my people," we all know with how great facility such recommendations may be obtained. The history of the passage of what is generally called the river and harbor bill shows how readily members of Congress will vote the public money for the promotion of objects of merely local character. In the administration of his office it was Brady's duty to guard and protect the general interests of the public against attempts from any quarter whatsoever to induce him to swerve from that fidelity to his trust which was required of him as well by the law as by his own personal honor. His office was a public trust, and its duties ought to have been fulfilled with perfect integrity, and with no other object in view but the public interests and obedience to the laws.

Another branch of this sixth prayer is that—

The law provides that no compensation shall be paid for any additional regular service rendered before the issuing of the order under which such service is to be rendered.

That is the law.

SEVENTH.

In considering the acts of the various defendants the jury will bear in mind :

1st. That forgery is a crime under the law.

That is so.

2d. That to alter in any particular, after it has been signed, a paper required or authorized by law to be executed is a forgery.

That is so.

3d. That to file any such forged paper in a department of the Government to obtain its action thereon is a crime.

That is so.

4th. That a false oath or affidavit, filed in a department of the Government, is criminal under the statutes of the United States, and punishable like forgery.

That is not exactly true. If it is filed by the man who makes it, or by the man who knows it is a false oath.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The language makes the oath a crime, instead of the act of a person. I suppose they meant the act of a person.

The COURT. That is a printer's mistake.

5th. That the filing of a false, fraudulent, altered, or forged paper in any department of the Government, with the design and intention thereby to deceive any executive officer of the Government with reference to a matter subject to his jurisdiction, for the benefit of the person filing the paper or causing it to be filed, is a crime under the statute law of the United States.

That is so. The fact is that all frauds upon the United States are:

6th. That the presentation of any claim to an executive department of the Government for payment, when said claim is fraudulent and so known to be by the person presenting the same, is a crime against the United States.

That is so by statute.

7th. That the presentation for payment to any department of the Government of a claim against the United States founded upon fraud, or upon a contract obtained by fraud, is a crime, if the person presenting the same or causing it to be presented is cognizant of the fraud.

That is true, too.

EIGHTH.

If the jury find that any of the orders of increase on the routes specified in the indictment were made on petitions, part of the signatures to which were forged by any one of the defendants, and on affidavits made by any one of the defendants and subsequently to the time when they were sworn to, interlined, erased, or filled up, or changed by any other of the defendants and made to speak falsely, and then filed in the Post-Office Department, these circumstances would afford strong if not conclusive evidence of a criminal combination among the parties participating in such transactions, and benefiting by the orders obtained in consequence thereof.

No, I am not prepared to go quite that length. If the thing was done in pursuance of the general design of the conspiracy——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] That is it.

The COURT. Then, with that qualification, I would grant that prayer.

NINTH.

The duty of making contracts on post routes and changing the same by increasing or expediting the service thereon, is, under the regulations of the Post-Office Department and the acts of Congress giving such regulations the authority of law, committed to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and he is responsible therefor; and the orders passed by him in the premises, although entered upon the journal which is signed by the Postmaster-General, derive their authority primarily from the Second

Assistant Postmaster-General; and if the jury find that the orders in evidence in this case, as the orders of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, were not made by him in obedience to instructions specifically given in that regard by the Postmaster-General, then the Second Assistant Postmaster-General can in no way protect himself from any and all of the consequences, civil and criminal, of such orders by reason of the fact that the Postmaster-General signed the journal of the department in which these orders are recorded.

That I need not answer.

The tenth I have answered, too.

The eleventh raises a question of law upon the act of April 7, 1880 :

In the second section of the act of Congress of April 7, 1880 (chapter 48), it is provided, "That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract either now existing or hereafter given to a rate of pay exceeding fifty per centum upon the contract as originally let."

That is the law.

If the jury find that upon any of the routes mentioned in the indictment, the defendant, Brady, prior to the seventh day of April, 1880, made an order for expediting and the allowance of increased pay and compensation therefor, and after the seventh day of April, 1880, the defendant, Brady, made another order to increase the number of trips, and allowing as pay for the increased trips a sum of money based upon the then existing cost of the trips including the expedition, that is, allowing for each of the trips so added a sum of money equal to the original cost of a trip with the cost of expedition added thereto, such an order and allowance of pay was a violation of the spirit of the law which the jury may take into account in considering the motive of Brady and the other testimony and circumstances concerning the charge laid in the indictment.

It is not a violation of the spirit of the law, but it is a violation of the letter of the law. The order may possibly have been within the spirit of the law; but it certainly is a violation of the letter of the law. It is just this, gentlemen: After an overhauling of this business to some extent by Congress the act of the 7th of April, 1880, was passed, which declared:

That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract either now existing or hereafter given to a rate of pay exceeding fifty per centum upon the contract as originally let.

Prior to that time one or more of these contracts had been expedited above 50 per cent. upon the original amount of the contract, and the number of trips increased also. After the passage of this law he made a still further allowance, not exceeding 50 per cent. upon the contract as then enlarged, as it was at the time. So that he treated the contracts which were then in operation under previous orders of expedition and increase as the basis upon which he allowed 50 per cent. additional. That, I understand, is the fact. The point is made that those allowances were beyond his authority. The law declared that no allowances, after the passage of the act, should be made beyond 50 per cent. upon the contract as originally let. The trips were once a week on slow time, and it had already been increased beyond that. I should say that it was a violation of the letter of the law. Whether his construction of the law was an innocent or a criminal construction of the law is for you to judge.

TWELFTH.

Section 3650 of the Revised Statutes provides that: "When any such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor shall be expressed in the order and entered upon the books of the department."

That is the law. The law was not always observed. These orders sometimes were made for increase of trips and expedition together, confused and mixed; you could not tell exactly from the form of the order how much was allowed for one and how much for the other. But the law provided that when an increase of service—that is, an increase in the number of trips per week—was made it should be expressed in the order and entered upon the books of the department. But some orders were for a round sum, for increase and expedition both in one order, not separating one from the other. That was not a compliance with the law. Whether it was a criminal non-observance of the law or not is for you to decide, gentlemen. I remember, in connection with that one route—the old case on Bismarck and Tongue River—where there was trouble about it, and Miner put in a proposition that he would run it three times a week, in sixty-five hours, for $35,000. There was nothing in the proposition to show anything about the men and horses or service, or anything of the kind. It was a simple proposition that he would do it for that sum—so many hours, three times a week. His offer was not accepted, but he was allowed $27,900. How much of that was on account of increase of service, and how much was on account of expedition, the order does not state. I may say just here that, somehow or other, that $27,900 grew up to be $35,000, and subsequent increases doubled it to $70,000. But there is nothing to show how it came.

THIRTEENTH.

If the jury find that the testimony of the witness, Rerdell, though that of an accomplice, is corroborated by other testimony in the case and circumstances that have been adduced in evidence, such testimony is not to be discredited because it is that of an accomplice.

That far it is right. An accomplice is a competent witness, though he stands under a cloud. And the court generally will instruct the jury that they ought not to convict anybody of a serious crime on the unsupported evidence of an accomplice. But if the accomplice is corroborated by established facts already proved in the case, or by other witnesses testifying to the same thing that the accomplice does, then the jury are safe in giving whatever credit they think the accomplice is entitled to. This is a little obscure sometimes. The accomplice is not to be credited if he is unsupported, but if he is supported he is to be credited. It looks very much as if it was the supporting evidence that is to be believed, and that that is sufficient without the evidence of the accomplice. Standing alone, the evidence of the accomplice is not enough. But in the progress of the trial the facts come out, some facts proved by one witness and some by another, and the case becomes surrounded by its features and form, and takes shape. Then if the testimony of an accomplice falls in with all those surrounding circumstances, corresponds with the shape and form of the case, he may be believed.

Therefore, if the jury are satisfied that said testimony is true in any material part thereof, and that in such material part it has been confirmed by unimpeachable evidence, such confirmation affords reasonable ground for belief that such testimony is true in all its other parts.

With that much of it I do not concur. The accomplice is good as far as he is supported; when he stands alone he falls.

FOURTEENTH.

Although the defendants are authorized by law to testify as witnesses on their own behalf, yet their testimony, like that of accomplices, is not to be regarded without suspicion; and the jury, in weighing its credibility, may take into consideration the deep interest which they have in their own acquittal and the great temptation under which they are to procure such acquittal by disregard of the sanctity of an oath.

Therefore, if the jury find in the present case that the testimony of the defendants who have appeared as witnesses on their own behalf is not full and explicit, or if they find it to be evasive, or if they find that the defendants, upon cross-examination, have failed to testify fully and to remember such facts as must necessarily have been within their knowledge and recollection, then they will be justified in refusing to give to such testimony the credence due to disinterested witnesses; and they will not regard the testimony of any two or more witnesses so testifying and corroborating each other as entitled to any greater credence than that of one alone.

My answer to that is this: That until comparatively within a few years parties were not competent witnesses. The law has now made them competent witnesses. They appear before you under well-known circumstances. They have every temptation, of course, to testify as strongly in their own favor as possible, and you will have to weigh their evidence with a regard to the knowledge of those facts and their temptation. They are like other witnesses, as to competency. But when a man is testifying as a father or as a son or other relative we all make allowance for the weakness of human nature, and in proportion to the strength of the temptation is the liberality of our allowance. It reminds me of the old practice at common law in an action of debt. The defendant was a competent witness for himself; he could perjure himself; he could swear that he had paid the debt. That is the only case in which I have any knowledge where a party at common law was a competent witness. But to be supported, he had to call in eleven compurgators, eleven of his neighbors of good character, who would testify that they believed him. Our law does not require that the defendants, who are competent witnesses for themselves, shall bring in eleven compurgators who will swear to their belief that what they say is true. But the common law grew out of the felt wants of society; it grew out of the nature of men. The rules of the common law were founded on practical knowledge of the motives which governed men; and when it required the defendant who was testifying for himself to bring in eleven of his neighbors to swear that they believed him, it showed that when a man swore for himself he needed to be confirmed. And I think practically we ought to consider with care, certainly, the testimony of a witness who is on the stand giving evidence on his own behalf under circumstances of this kind. That is all I can say—to weigh and consider their evidence under all the circumstances and give it such weight as it is entitled to.

MR. INGERSOLL. What does the court say as to the latter part of it, as to more than one, four, or five witnesses swearing the same way and corroborating each other?

THE COURT. [Reading:]

And they will not regard the testimony of any two or more witnesses—

That is, defendants—

so testifying and corroborating each other as entitled to any greater credence than that of one alone.

No, I do not concur with that. What I have said is an answer to that prayer.

FIFTEENTH.

When a defendant in a criminal cause becomes a witness on his own behalf, and has been notified to produce books and papers admitted by him or shown to have been in his possession, and which, if produced, would have been competent evidence in the cause, and upon cross examination such defendant witness reiterates his refusal to produce such books and papers, the jury is entitled to presume that such books and papers, if produced, would have disclosed evidence disadvantageous to such defendant, and that such failure casts suspicion on all the other evidence adduced by said defendant, and is a circumstance tending to prove his guilt.

I cannot grant that prayer. It is not correct, in my judgment. The general rule is that a man is not bound to give evidence against himself. I mean, by that, that he is not obliged to go on the stand and testify against himself. But, if there be evidence in his possession which may have the effect of criminating him, and that evidence is of a documentary character, and the Government gives him notice to produce it, he may produce it, in compliance with that notice, or not. His simple refusal to produce the evidence does not at all establish what the prosecution proposes to prove by the evidence. That would be very unjust, because it might not be sufficient, if produced, for that purpose. He has a right to say, "This is my evidence, I am not going to produce it." And what follows from that? There is no inference from that at all. The law does not allow any unfavorable inference to be drawn from his simple refusal. But if he refuses to produce the evidence the other side may give secondary evidence of the contents of such documentary evidence as he has refused to produce, and if that documentary evidence be sufficient to establish the fact which the prosecution seeks to establish the question will depend upon the secondary evidence. It is the fault of the other party that it is secondary. If there be imperfection in this secondary evidence he has no right to complain of that. The secondary evidence is good for all that it can fairly prove; and if in some respects it is deficient the man who holds the primary evidence in his hand or in his pocket and had it in his power to produce it will not be allowed to say, "That is not so." After holding back the primary evidence he cannot afterwards contradict or impeach the secondary. Here is what the Supreme Court of the United States says upon that subject in the case of Hanson vs. Eustace's Lessee, 2 How., 708:

The refusal to produce books under notice lays the foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence. It affords neither presumptive nor prima facie evidence of the fact sought to be proved by them. A party cannot infer from the refusal to produce books which had been called for that, if produced, they would establish the fact which he alleges they would prove. The party in such a case may give secondary evidence of the contents of such books or papers; and if such secondary evidence is imperfect, vague, and uncertain as to dates, sums, boundaries, &c., every intendment and presumption as to such particulars shall be against the party who might remove all doubt by producing the higher evidence.

(Life and Fire Insurance Company of New York vs. Mechanics' Insurance Company, 7 Wend., 31.)

I think that case has been referred to in this argument at some time or other. And further:

All inferences shall be taken from the inferior evidence most strongly against the party refusing to produce; but the refusal itself raises no presumption of suspicion or imputation to the discredit of the party, except in a case of spoliation or equivalent suppression. There the rule is that omnia præsumentur contra spoliatores. In other words, with the exception just mentioned, the refusal to produce books or papers upon notice is not an independent element from which anything can be inferred as to the point which is sought to be proved by the books or papers.

That is an answer to that prayer by the highest authority, and in language clearer than I could use.

Mr. MERRICK. It is an answer to the first part, and very satisfactory, of course. As to the second part, beginning in the fourth line:

—and upon cross-examination such defendant witness reiterates his refusal to produce—

The COURT. [Interposing.] I will say a word about that:

—and upon cross-examination such defendant witness reiterates his refusal to produce such books and papers, the jury is entitled to presume that such books and papers, if produced, would have disclosed evidence disadvantageous to such defendant, and that such failure casts suspicion on all the other evidence adduced by said defendant, and is a circumstance tending to prove his guilt.

I do not see that he is under any more disadvantage when he is under cross-examination than when he is under notice. I think it is the same. He is not bound to produce books when he is on cross-examination any more than he was when he was under notice. The same rule would apply to both.

SIXTEENTH.

And the jury is further instructed that the manner in which the counsel for the defendant, S. W. Dorsey, offered to produce said books and papers should in no way lessen or mitigate the force of any presumption or inference to be drawn from the non-production of the same, for the reason that such offer was so qualified that the court could not recognize it, even if counsel for the Government had accepted it, and the jury will therefore regard such offer only as further evidence, establishing by the admission of the said defendant, of his possession of the said books and papers, and the fact that they were within reach and within the power of the said defendant to produce the same during the trial, if he had thought proper to do so; and the jury will therefore draw from the non-production of said books and papers the presumptions and inferences as directed in the instructions heretofore given by the court.

You remember, gentlemen, that after the notice to produce these books was given to Mr. Dorsey, Mr. Ingersoll, on behalf of Mr. Dorsey, came in with a proposition that he would refer the examination of the books to three gentlemen to be selected in a certain way. That is not the way we try cases in court. The court could not allow such a proposition to be carried out. If it had been acceded to by the other side, the court would not have allowed it to be carried out. A man who has received notice to produce his books, and does not want to have his books run through and examined by curious eyes that might alight upon them in the court-room, has the right to stitch together the leaves, except as to such portions as contain the evidence sought for by the notice. But he is not obliged to produce the books at all. If he will produce the books in obedience to the notice, he may take that course. But the court cannot assist him by appointing three or four gentlemen not connected with the court, not on the jury, to examine the books and see what evidence they contain. But if he produced the books, he might have stitched the leaves together which he did not want seen, and leave open such parts of the books as contain the evidence sought for, if there was any such. That is the answer I make to the sixteenth.

The seventeenth prayer is a description of what a conspiracy is. That I think I need not answer any further than I have.

EIGHTEENTH.

In a case of conspiracy one alone cannot be found guilty. There must be two or more.

Still, in this case, there is a further prayer that, as Rerdell was one of the defendants, and he has pleaded guilty, the question is whether the jury are at liberty to convict any other one of the defendants, provided they believe that he was in conspiracy with Rerdell. I think so.

NINETEENTH.

If the jury find that James W. Bosler, R. P. Williamson, L. P. Williamson, Charles Pelham, or either of them, was a person whose testimony would have been material on the part of one or more of the defendants, and was a witness, or were witnesses, that should have been called to testify on behalf of such defendant or defendants, and was or were not called to so testify, the failure to call such witness or witnesses is a circumstance for the jury to consider when deciding upon the evidence against defendant or defendants.

Who is L. P. Williamson?

Mr. MERRICK. He was the copartner on Tongue River.

Mr. CARPENTER. Nothing is said about any man of that sort.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is no such man anywhere that I ever heard of.

The COURT. Charles Pelham is the lawyer?

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

The COURT. Moore, on cross-examination, was asked whether he did not state certain things to Pelham that were inconsistent with and contradictory of the evidence he gave in court, and he said he did not. I cannot grant this prayer as to Pelham, because the failure to call him would not be a failure to call a witness to anything except as to a conversation that the witness Moore is said to have had with Pelham, not that he could testify to a fact in the case at all. The fact that Pelham was not called after such cross-examination as that is a demonstration to my mind—and I think it will have great weight with the jury—that you could not make out by Pelham the facts which you seemed to intimate by your cross-examination in regard to his conversation with Pelham. You could not contradict the testimony of Moore, because Pelham was here, and you called Moore's attention to what he said to Pelham, and Moore said that he did not say so to Pelham, and when you did not call Pelham, there it stopped. Moore remained uncontradicted, so far as that went. It goes no further. It merely relates to something that Moore might have said in a conversation. It does not strengthen Moore's testimony as to the facts in the case.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is it.

The COURT. It only shows that if Moore lied here, he lied there, too.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Suppose we found out afterwards that Mr. Pelham was his attorney, and did not know it at the time?

Mr. MERRICK. You cannot make anything out of that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Suppose we did.

The COURT. I do not know.

Mr. MERRICK. That does not help it.

The COURT. You ought to have found that out before.

Mr. MERRICK. I think you had better let the court go on without interruption.

The COURT. As to these others, Bosler and the two Williamsons, if the jury can recollect exactly where their testimony ought to come in, and can tell whether it was given or not, they may draw any inferences.

Mr. BLISS. As to Bosler it is very clear as to the affidavit of June, 1881—

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] I do not believe we ought to argue this case now.

Mr. MERRICK. You have been doing it all the time.

The COURT. If there be a question over a fact, and that question could be settled by calling a witness who was known to have been present at the transaction, and that witness is not called, it is a fact which the jury may consider in regard to the other evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That applies to both sides, I suppose.

The COURT. Yes, that applies to both sides.

TWENTIETH.

If the jury find that William H. Betts was a witness whose testimony would have been material on the part of the defendants, and when called to the stand and examined as a witness on the part of the defendants, was not examined or interrogated upon questions that were material in the issue, and in contradiction of the testimony given by A. W. Moore after the foundation having been laid for such contradiction, upon cross-examination, the failure to so examine or interrogate him raises the presumption that the testimony of the witness Betts in that respect would not have been favorable to the defendants, and is a circumstance for the jury to consider when deciding upon the evidence against the defendants.

I make the same answer to that as to the nineteenth prayer.

Mr. MERRICK. The same answer as to Pelham.

The COURT. Now, gentlemen, I have gone through with the prayers for the prosecution. If you gentlemen for the defendants will now be kind enough to point out which of the defendants' prayers have not been substantially answered I will turn to them and answer them. I find that I have taken a great deal more time than I supposed I should.

Mr. HENKLE. Your honor has not answered the first prayer.

Mr. CARPENTER. The jury would like to take a short recess, if the court please, I understand them to say.

Mr. DAVIDGE. If the jury can take a recess we can employ the time in running over these prayers.

The COURT. Very well, we will take a recess.

Mr. MERRICK. For fifteen minutes?

The COURT. For fifteen minutes.

At 2 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m. the court took a short recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call the attention of the court to the first prayer.

The COURT. You want an answer to that?

Mr. INGERSOLL. We would like it; yes, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. If your honor is not going directly through them, I would suggest that your attention be called at one time to all that they desire an answer to.

The COURT. I do not feel inclined to interfere with the jury as to the order of their investigation. This prayer is:

It is the duty of the jury first to determine whether there was such a conspiracy as that set out in the indictment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Just leave out the word "first."

The COURT. [Reading:]

And in considering this question they are to start with the presumption that there was no such conspiracy.

Mr. MERRICK. His honor has answered that already as to the presumption.

The COURT. No. The conspiracy is personated here as a sort of defendant, in whose favor presumptions of innocence shall arise. I have no objection to instructing the jury that as to each of these defendants there is a presumption of innocence at the beginning, and the jury must be satisfied of their guilt as charged beyond a reasonable doubt.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is sufficient.

The COURT. That covers the ground, I suppose.

Mr. HENKLE. I call the attention of the court to the latter part of that prayer, after the semicolon.

The COURT. [Reading:]

And if they can account for all the facts and circumstances in the case upon any hypothesis consistent with the non-existence of such conspiracy, it will be their duty to find that there was no such conspiracy, in which event they will, of course, find the defendants not guilty without further inquiry.

I cannot grant that.

Mr. HENKLE. I desire to reserve an exception.

The COURT. I am going to explain why :

And if they can account for all facts and circumstances in the case upon any hypothesis consistent with the non-existence of such conspiracy——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] Upon any reasonable hypothesis.

The COURT. A hypothesis growing out of the evidence in the case.

Mr. HENKLE. Certainly.

The COURT. You have not stated it that way.

Mr. HENKLE. I would like to add that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is proper—any reasonable hypothesis growing out of the evidence.

The COURT. A man might be found murdered upon the highway, and if a jurymen is to be allowed to indulge his imagination as to all the hypotheses to account for that loss of life, he might suppose that he was killed by an ærolite, which would be inconsistent with the charge of murder.

Mr. HENKLE. Does your honor give it in the modified form ?

The COURT. Oh, yes ; I will give it in that form—“ any reasonable hypothesis based upon the evidence.”

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call your honor's attention to the twenty-first prayer.

Mr. MERRICK. What is to be done with the intermediate prayers ? Are those all answered ? I suppose it is to be understood that all the intermediate ones are answered, your honor ?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not want to have any mistake about it.

The COURT. What about the twenty-first ?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the twenty-first.

The COURT. That is in these words :

The hypothesis of guilt of the offense charged in the indictment should flow naturally from the facts proven and be consistent with them all. The evidence must be such as to exclude any reasonable hypothesis but that of their guilt of the offense imputed to them ; or, in other words, the facts proved must all be consistent with and point to their guilt, not only, but they must be inconsistent with their innocence.

If the evidence can be reconciled either with the theory of innocence or guilt, the law requires the jury to give the accused the benefit of the doubt, and to adopt the theory of innocence.

That is stating it more strongly than I have ever seen it stated before.

Mr. BLISS. That portion about the facts being all consistent with and pointing to their guilt, I think your honor has already answered.

The COURT. Yes.

Or, in other words, the facts proved must all be consistent with and point to their guilt.

All that part of it I cannot grant. I grant the rest of the prayer, striking out all after the word “ or,” after the semicolon in the fourth line.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The last paragraph:

If the evidence can be reconciled——

The COURT. [Interposing and reading:]

If the evidence can be reconciled either with the theory of innocence or guilt——

Do you mean either the theory of innocence or guilt ?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

The COURT. [Reading:]

the law requires the jury to give the accused the benefit of the doubt, and to adopt the theory of innocence.

That is correct.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call the attention of the court to the twenty-second prayer, commencing at the second paragraph.

The COURT. Oh, yes; I have substantially told the jury that. That prayer is:

The issues to be determined are, first, whether the alleged conspiracy was entered into for such object—

That is, for the purpose of defrauding the United States—and, secondly, whether any one or more of the parties to such conspiracy afterwards did any act with the intent to effect such object. And unless both these issues are found for the Government the verdict of the jury must be for the defendants.

It must be a conspiracy, and one or more acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy within the period of the statute limitations.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, the next paragraph.

The COURT. That is all you care about.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The next paragraph commencing, "To constitute conspiracy."

Mr. MERRICK. Your honor answered that in your charge.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to call the attention of the court to the next paragraph but one, commencing, "Acts and conduct."

The COURT. [Reading:]

Acts and conduct on the part of the defendants, however consistent with the theory of a conspiracy, do not constitute such conspiracy, unless sufficient to satisfy the jury that there was a combination of minds and that the parties did in fact enter into the conspiracy as charged.

That is true with simply this explanation: That we have no means of knowing what passes in a man's mind, except by his acts and conduct.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is implied in the passage.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The twenty-fifth, if the court please.

The COURT. That is:

There is but one conspiracy charged in the indictment.

That is true. There is but one conspiracy charged in the indictment, and that is a conspiracy that existed on the 20th of May, 1879, or since. The date of the conspiracy is fixed in the indictment as the 23d of May, 1879. The date is of no consequence, provided the conspiracy was within the period of the statute and since.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call the attention of the court now to the thirty-first, thirty-second, thirty-third, thirty-fourth, thirty-fifth, and thirty-seventh.

The COURT. Begin at the thirty-first.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I can shorten that, your honor. They all relate to the proposition that has been argued in respect of the repeal of section 5440 by the act of May 17, 1879. They were merely put in for the purpose of saving the point, which is already determined.

The COURT. Still you want me to answer it. In answer to the thirty-first, thirty-second, thirty-fourth, thirty-fifth, and thirty-seventh prayers I say: This indictment is based upon the statute of the 17th of May, 1879. That is the same statute which I read to you as section 5440 of the Revised Statutes, except that the punishment has been altered. This indictment is under the statute of the 17th of May, 1879, for this reason:

That nothing could be included in the indictment except what has transpired since the 20th of May, 1879. On the 20th of May, 1879, the statute of May 17, 1879, was in full force. If there was a law violated by these parties it was the act of May 17, 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. Those prayers are all denied?

The COURT. Yes. The thirty-seventh prayer I do not——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I do not understand what that means.

The COURT. [Reading:]

If the time of any act charged as an overt act shall be found by the jury to be before the 17th of May, 1879, they must acquit the defendants.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That should be before the 20th of May or the 23d, I should think. No, the 17th is right.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is critically correct.

The COURT. I refuse that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. You refuse all the prayers bearing upon that point?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. The fifty-eighth, fifty-ninth, sixtieth, and sixty-first are all upon the same point, and they are overruled, I suppose.

Mr. BLISS. The fifty-ninth is not necessarily to be overruled.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, it is.

Mr. BLISS. The only point about that is that the 17th of May is outside of the period of the statute of limitations, and it might open a question. I would leave it to say that the conspiracy was entered into between May 17 and 23. That would be good. I want to avoid that trouble.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It has no relation to a subject of that sort.

Mr. BLISS. I know; but it is capable of that interpretation.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Not a bit of it.

Mr. MERRICK. The charge has answered it before. It does not make any difference when it was entered into.

The COURT. I have told the jury over and over again that there must have been an existing conspiracy with an overt act since the 20th of May, 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. That covers the whole of it.

Mr. WILSON. These are refused as requested?

The COURT. Yes. The sixtieth is refused, too.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose the fifty-eighth, fifty-ninth, sixtieth, and sixty-first all stand in the same category?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The court has, I believe, instructed the jury as to the eighty-eighth, eighty-ninth, ninetieth, ninety-first, and ninety-second. Perhaps I had better call the attention of the court to ninety-third, ninety-fourth, and ninety-fifth.

The COURT. Yes; I have substantially ruled upon those.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The ninety-sixth.

The COURT. What do you say as to the ninety-sixth?

Mr. INGERSOLL. As to the ninety-sixth and ninety-seventh, according to our view those routes appear to have been the property of J. L. Sanderson, contracted for at full rates; and, if so, we ask that the overt acts upon those routes shall not be considered as overt acts in this case.

Mr. BLISS. We say it does not make any difference for whose benefit they defrauded the United States, whether for their own or for Sanderson's.

The COURT. Who was the contractor on that route?

Mr. BLISS. Miner, I think, and it was sublet.

The COURT. I shall refuse that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. And so with the next?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The next is the same.

Mr. WILSON. In that same connection, the sixty-second, sixty-third, and sixty-fourth are upon the same subject, and I want them disposed of.

Mr. BLISS. Those are the overt acts as to the presentment of claims.

Mr. WILSON. As to the orders of Brady and as to the presentment of claims.

Mr. BLISS. Has not the court ruled upon those in connection with the ninety-second?

Mr. INGERSOLL. We are simply calling attention to them.

The COURT. Oh, yes; I overrule them.

Mr. WILSON. We reserve an exception.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, the ninety-ninth.

The COURT. The ninety-ninth is correct substantially, I think.

Mr. MERRICK. That applies to all witnesses on either side.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir; on either side.

The COURT. [Reading:]

The jury are instructed that they are the exclusive judges of the weight that is to be given to the evidence of each witness. The jury have the right to take into consideration the circumstances under which each witness testifies, the motive that each witness has, his appearance upon the stand, and if the jury believe that Rerdell, or Moore, or any other witness, knowingly swore falsely in any material point, the jury have the right to disregard the entire testimony of such witness.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is right.

The COURT. That is the law as laid down in the case of the Santisima Trinidad.

Mr. MERRICK. And that applied to all the witnesses, for the defendants and all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is what it says.

The COURT. That is the universal law. If a witness on the stand deliberately swears falsely to any matter material in the case, knowing that his testimony is false, there is nothing in that man's character that we can rely upon for the truth. There is no truth in him. It would be unsafe to trust him for anything.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to call your honor's attention to the fifty-fourth, fifty-fifth, and fifty-sixth prayers. They refer more to the structure of the indictment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The court has answered all those.

Mr. WILSON. I think so, too, but I want the point saved.

The COURT. Yes, I have answered that. The fifty-fourth is refused because it has been answered already; the fifty-fifth is refused for the same reason; the fifty-sixth the same.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is only one more, the nineteenth.

Mr. MERRICK. I think your honor has answered that prayer.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to have his honor look at it and read it, and see if he thinks it is the law.

The COURT. That is an excellent statement of the law upon the subject, and although I have really charged substantially to the same effect, yet I will read it because it is a very clear exposition of the law upon that point.

Mr. BLISS. I think it is from Judge Dillon.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No matter who wrote it.

The COURT. [Reading:]

The proof of guilt is upon the Government, and the law clothes the defendants with a presumption of innocence which attends and protects them until it is overcome by testimony which proves their guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, which means that the evidence of their guilt, as charged, must be clear, positive, and abiding, fully satisfying the minds and consciences of the jury. It is not sufficient in a criminal case to justify a verdict of guilty that there may be a strong suspicion, or even strong probabilities of guilt, but what the law requires is proof, by legal, creditable evidence of such a nature, that when it is all considered by the jury giving it its natural effect, they feel, when they have weighed and considered it all, a clear understanding and entirely satisfactory conviction of the defendants' guilt.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is the law, I believe.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Now, we desire the privilege of excepting in detail to any passages in the charge of the court this morning, after the record is printed.

The COURT. Oh, no; you will have to take your exceptions before the jury leave the box.

Mr. DAVIDGE. To the charge of the court?

The COURT. Yes. There were some prayers presented yesterday by Mr.——

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] Your honor has always allowed this privilege when giving a long charge like this, covering two hours or more.

The COURT. Yes; but you see how unjust it would be.

Mr. DAVIDGE. How so?

The COURT. I am going to tell you. If you call the attention of the court to a mistake which the court has made in its charge that mistake may be corrected with the jury before us, but after the jury have gone, you pick out some blot in the charge——

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] We do not propose to pick out any blots.

The COURT. Then I will imagine that in some other case some other lawyer might do so.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It is hardly to be presumed that the court will unsay what it has said, and I never understood the practice to apply to any statement by a court that was subject to any doubt whatever; but where the court has deliberately stated the law you have given to counsel the liberty, when the charge is printed, to make specific exceptions.

The COURT. No; that is not the rule.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That has been the practice, I believe, as a general thing.

Mr. MERRICK. The rule is exactly the other way.

The COURT. I have not had as much practice, probably, as you, Mr. Davidge.

Mr. BLISS. His honor ruled at the last trial that he would not do it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I know nothing of that trial.

Mr. MERRICK. The rule is that the exceptions must be taken before the jury leave the box.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Supposing that the privilege would be granted, I did not take notes as your honor from time to time uttered your views. There are two matters, however, that I find I did note, more from the force of habit than anything else.

I desire to reserve an exception to so much of the charge as states that the averment with reference to an overt act that it was in pursuance of and to effect the object of the conspiracy is mere matter of form.

I desire to reserve another exception to the statement of the court that under this indictment, knowingly using an affidavit, for instance, is equivalent to filing, as an overt act. Your honor will recollect that the overt act charged is that the parties filed. You say that whether they filed or not, although they had nothing to do with the filing, and although the indictment charges them with filing, yet the use is equivalent to the filing. I do not understand that to be so.

I desire to except to all that portion of the charge where it appears to me you make a new averment in lieu of the ones made in the indictment.

I desire further to except to so much of the charge as relates to the statute of limitations. I think, however, on reflection, that that is included in the exceptions that are contained in a series of prayers for the defendants.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Now, those are all that I have noted, and I only noted them in the first half hour or hour, supposing that the ordinary privilege would be granted to the defendants.

The COURT. What shall we do with the other prayers to which you have not called the attention of the court? How shall they be regarded—as withdrawn?

Mr. MERRICK. They should be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. BLISS. They cannot certainly be overruled and excepted to without some attention being called to them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. In looking them over, if the court please—

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] Your honor will observe that we have been acting upon our recollection of your honor's charge and have conformed our action to our memory of that charge, which may be very defective indeed. I supposed, therefore, that you would certainly extend to us the privilege of excepting to the charge when it should be printed, and when we could see and critically examine the different passages of it. You now call upon us to act in the dark.

The COURT. I think I had better go over all the omitted prayers and pass upon them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will state to the court the point I make: That where the court has passed upon a question involved in the prayers, I did not ask any more about it. That is our view. For instance, to show the court how I have acted, take the fifth prayer:

Brady had a legal right to make orders for increases of trips and for expedition of service—

And the court said that, provided he acted in good faith. So I do not care to ask that. The sixth the same, and the seventh the same, which the court has really answered.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I think this arrangement would be satisfactory to all parties: Wherever your honor has expressed yourself on any point which is involved in any prayer, and your declaration is in opposition to the view taken in the prayer, then the prayer shall be regarded as refused.

The COURT. Of course.

Mr. MERRICK. Let me suggest one single thing. I think the safest plan would be for your honor to take these prayers and go over them and decide every point.

Mr. BLISS. For instance, if your honor will look at the fifty-second prayer, and treat it as overruled—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] If the court please, we will withdraw all the prayers to which we have not specifically directed your honor's attention.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We do not want anything more.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We do not want anything done about which there could be any question. There might be some prayer where my judgment might differ from your honor's as to whether you answered it or not. So we withdraw all of them to which we have not called your attention.

Mr. WILSON. Now I desire to reserve exceptions to certain portions of the general charge given by the court to the jury :

To that portion of the charge which relates to the productiveness of these routes I except.

To that portion of the charge where the court in substance said to the jury, as I understood it, that it was not necessary that these parties should be mutually interested in these contracts after the 20th of May, 1879, as charged in the indictment, I desire to except.

I desire also to reserve an exception to that portion of the charge in which the court stated to the jury that the presumption was that the combination continued from the 1st of April to the 20th of May.

The COURT. I said that, in the absence of proof that the new arrangement had been dissolved, the presumption would continue the existence along after the first of May.

Mr. WILSON. I will except to it in that form also.

The COURT. That is no variation from the form I put it in whatever; it is the same thing.

Mr. WILSON. Of course it is impossible for me to recollect the exact phraseology the court used. I only take these exceptions by reference to subjects.

Mr. Davidge has already reserved an exception, I believe, to your honor's instruction as to the overt acts.

I desire to reserve an exception also to what the court said in respect of the seventh prayer for the prosecution, in which, as I understood, your honor said that all frauds against the United States are criminal.

I also reserve an exception to what the court said in respect of the eighth, eleventh, twelfth, fourteenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth prayers of the prosecution severally.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, in the course of your charge——

The COURT. [Interposing.] Let me ask, Do you withdraw the prayers you presented yesterday ?

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Ingersoll withdrew all.

Mr. WILSON. All are withdrawn with the exception of those to which your attention has been called to-day.

Mr. MERRICK. So I understand.

Mr. BLISS. There were certain suggestions that came up in the course of your honor's charge which I desire to put in the form of requests, though I apprehend none of them will be disputed on either side. I desire that you charge the jury that though Peck is not on trial, they may still find any one or more of the defendants guilty of a conspiracy with Peck ; that they have a right under the indictment, if they think the evidence is sufficient, to so find. Also, that although Rerdell has pleaded guilty, they may still treat him as one of the conspirators the same as if he had not.

The COURT. I so ruled as to Rerdell.

Mr. BLISS. I did not hear you. As to Peck, your honor rather seemed to withdraw him.

The COURT. Peck is dead. I do not remember when he died.

Mr. BLISS. It is unimportant. My request is that if the evidence sustains it the jury are entitled to find that one or more of these defendants conspired with Peck, and if they so find, they may bring in a verdict of guilty.

Mr. MERRICK. It does not make any difference.

The COURT. I don't think that is necessary. Peck is dead, and not to be tried.

Mr. MERRICK. Let him go. Let him rest in peace.

The COURT. It is true that a man may be convicted of conspiracy with another who is not named in the indictment at all; but if it appears to the court that the party named is dead, I do not see how he can be convicted.

Mr. BLISS. Suppose one party has conspired with another and both are indicted and then one dies, the decisions are clear that the remaining one can be convicted of conspiracy with him.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. BLISS. That is what I mean.

The COURT. What I inquired about is this: This conspiracy is confined to a certain date.

Mr. BLISS. Yes; it appears that he died long after that. Mr. Dorsey testified that he died on the 21st of August, 1881, I think, or somewhere along there.

The COURT. I have no objection to that prayer. I think your prayer can be sustained.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor stated that no man could be convicted by any but his own acts. I ask your honor to add to that that if he enters into a conspiracy he is then bound by the acts of others committed in pursuance of the conspiracy to effectuate its object, the same as if he had done the act himself.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He said that all through the prayers.

Mr. BLISS. He did not say it in his charge.

The COURT. My attention has not been called directly to that point.

Mr. MERRICK. No.

The COURT. It is a very important point in the case, too.

Mr. MERRICK. As Mr. Davidge says, your honor has ruled it all along through the trial from time to time. Your honor so ruled at the time you determined that testimony should be admitted as the acts of one against all. You honor first ruled that the acts of one were permitted against himself, and then, upon the establishment of a prima facie case, or such a case as your honor thought was sufficient for the court, you admitted the acts of one to go to the jury as evidence against all. If the jury find that there was a combination and conspiracy between them, then the acts of one bind all the defendants, because being done in pursuance of the conspiracy.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Nobody disputes that.

Mr. MERRICK. They admit that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We admit it.

Mr. BLISS. I was out during one portion of your charge, your honor, and therefore I am not quite certain whether you covered this point or not; I ask you to charge the jury that in considering the fact of the non-production of any books or papers, they will treat it in the case of the failure so to produce by a witness on the stand with such inferences as they may think are justified by that fact in connection with his deportment and bearing and in connection with the other evidence in the case, showing, if it does show, that such books or papers were in his possession or under his control. I am directing it to a question of the presumption of fact; that while there may be no presumption of law other than that the secondary evidence stands from a failure to produce books or papers, yet that they are entitled from the failure to produce books or papers to draw such inferences as to the contents of those books or papers, and such other inferences as the evidence seemed to them to justify.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The court has covered that.

The COURT. I cannot grant that in that shape.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is already covered.

The COURT. If a party received notice to produce his books and fails to produce them, his failure to produce them creates no evidence against himself that far. It throws the burden of proving the fact by secondary evidence on the other side. The other side then produces this secondary evidence, and if that evidence is not satisfactory in any way to the person who has failed to produce his books, he has himself to blame for it. He has got the books, and if the secondary evidence is not true, that results from the fact of his failure to produce the primary evidence which was in his possession. Under these circumstances the jury are to draw such inferences as to the facts connected with the whole transaction in connection with the notice to produce, and the failure, as the evidence will justify.

Mr. MERRICK. That is all. The jury will draw such inferences as they think the failure to produce on notice or on cross-examination will justify.

The COURT. As to the cross-examination, I don't care anything about that, because it is nothing more than the refusal.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The same old thing.

The COURT. The same old thing. Do you want me to say anything about the other prayers as to the effect of one man's evidence against the others?

Mr. MERRICK. No. They have conceded that to be the law as I stated it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If there is a conspiracy established, and one of the conspirators does an act to further the conspiracy, it is the act of all. We admit that.

Mr. BLISS. That is all I have to say.

Mr. WILSON. I think the court ought to add to that that in proving the conspiracy they cannot take the acts of one person against another, or the declarations of one against another.

The COURT. That is a very important suggestion.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Your honor has ruled in accordance with that.

The COURT. I have ruled it during the trial, but I have not heard any prayer to the point on this occasion.

Mr. WILSON. I have one here, but I thought your honor had covered it.

The COURT. If you suppose it is covered, very well.

Mr. WILSON. I have one here on that very subject.

The COURT. I do not want to be understood as refusing to answer such a prayer as that.

Mr. MERRICK. There is nothing on the record.

The COURT. That is all now, gentlemen.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). Some of the jury desire to know if they can have a copy of the judge's charge.

The COURT. You cannot catch it any more than you can catch the air. All that there is of the charge is in your memories now. I have not written anything at all. There are several reasons for not doing so. One is that I dislike writing. I am getting to be an old man, and I do not like the labor of writing. Another reason is that I did not know what aspect the case might assume up to the last minute.

Mr. MERRICK. I presume your honor might say to the jury that if they have any difficulty and want further instructions, and will address the court, your honor will give them assistance.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I expect they know that.

Mr. MERRICK. It will not do any harm to tell them.

The COURT. The jury, intelligent as they are, do not possess all knowledge.

Mr. MERRICK. That is a point that has not come up before.

The COURT. Gentlemen of the jury, if you are at a loss about any question of law and will apprise the court of the fact, the court will with pleasure try to explain your difficulties at any time. On questions of fact I cannot interfere with you. You are superior to me as to those. [To the clerk.] Administer the oath to the bailiffs, and let them take the jury to some private and convenient place, to be kept without fire and light.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Especially without fire.

[Three bailiffs were here sworn and took charge of the jury.]

Mr. MERRICK. If your honor please, one of the jurors indicates that he would like to have some dinner.

The COURT. Oh, well; we will not starve the jury. The jury are entitled to their dinner.

Mr. MERRICK. That is what I thought.

The DISTRICT ATTORNEY. If the court please, the marshal asks that, as some of the deputies or bailiffs are new in their office, the court will give them instructions as to how far they can communicate with the jury and what they can allow the jury to receive.

The COURT. The jury is to be taken to their quarters. They are not to be allowed to separate. They are to be kept together. No person is to be allowed to enter the room or have communication with them. The bailiffs are not to communicate with the jurors themselves in any way, except to communicate such messages as the court shall authorize them to communicate.

The FOREMAN. How about sleeping accommodations?

The COURT. Of course you will have sleeping accommodations provided for you in case you want to sleep. The marshal informs me that he will be able to furnish the jurors with fair accommodations in the building. I think that is best. They will be furnished with their meals out. They can be accompanied by the bailiffs to their meals. Gentlemen, if you find that you have difficulty about making up your verdict before night the marshal will furnish you with accommodations. You will probably be more comfortable in some room in this new building than you would be in a hotel. You are entitled to the pleadings in the case, and that is all. There are five thousand pages of evidence in the case. I think it would embarrass any jury, and embarrass any twelve lawyers in the land to take those five thousand pages, in five or six volumes, and go over them and compare one piece of evidence with another. The best way possible to become acquainted with a case is to be with it from the start, hearing and seeing in just the manner that the jury have done in this case. They can understand the case a great deal better in that way than by reading the evidence. The law, which is wise in everything, is wise in that particular. [After a pause.] The marshal makes a suggestion, which is a very appropriate one. If the jury should remain out during the night their friends might want to send them coats or cloaks or something of that kind, and if there is no objection I will authorize the deputies to receive from their friends everything of that kind, being careful that nothing contraband is concealed in them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We have no objection.

Mr. BLISS. We have none.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We do not care.

The FOREMAN. Can we receive any communications in regard to our business transactions?

The COURT. No. That ought not to be allowed except by permission of the court.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I suppose they can be submitted to your honor.

The COURT. Yes. We will take a recess now, gentlemen, with the understanding that the court will meet here to-morrow morning, but will come if sent for in the mean time at any hour before bed-time.

Mr. BLISS. At what time to-morrow? Eleven or ten o'clock.

The COURT. Ten o'clock.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I suppose if the jury want the court they can send for him.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. Up to 12 o'clock to-night?

The COURT. Hardly until twelve.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Say eleven.

The COURT. Gentlemen, if you send for me before 10 o'clock I shall come.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The adjournment will be until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The COURT. There will be no adjournment.

Mr. MERRICK. Recess.

The COURT. We will take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

At this point (3 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the jury retired and the court took a recess until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

AFTER RECESS.

(Ten o'clock a. m., Wednesday, June 13, 1883.)

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

The COURT. [To the crier.] Has the jury reported yet?

Mr. DONALDSON (the crier). No, sir.

The COURT. [At 10.19 a. m., to Mr. Donaldson.] Go to the jury and ask them, for the court, if they have agreed upon a verdict.

[After a short time Mr. Donaldson returned from the jury-room and reported privately to the court.]

The COURT. If the jury, or any one of them, say that they want instructions upon any question of law, they are entitled to have it. They did not say that they all wanted instructions?

Mr. DONALDSON. No, sir.

The COURT. Even if one juror has difficulties with a question of law and desires instructions from the court, I think he is entitled to relief. You may report to the jury that the court is of opinion that if they, or any of them, have difficulties upon any question of law, and will come into court, the court will try to relieve them.

[The crier again went to the jury-room, and returned and reported privately to the court.]

The COURT. [At 10.35 a. m.] The messenger reports to the court that the juror thinks it is a question of law, while the foreman thinks it is a question of fact; so that there is evidently a disagreement. [To Mr. Donaldson.] You can tell them to come down and let the point be stated to the court, and the court will judge whether it is a question of law or a question of fact.

[At 10.37 a. m. the jury came into the court-room, when, before they had taken their places, Juror John H. Vernon fell on the floor with an exclamation as if in great pain, and was apparently unconscious.]

The COURT. The audience will keep their places, and not crowd around him.

[Mr. Vernon was then carried into the adjoining room.]

The COURT. The balance of the jury had better retire to their room. This man, for the time, must be in charge of a doctor. Let the rest of the jurors be sent to their room until he recovers.

The COURT. [After a pause, having been informed that Dr. Z. T. Sowers was present in the court-room.] Dr. Sowers is requested to take charge of this patient.

[At 10.43 a. m.] I had better not take a recess until I see the result of this affair. I had better remain here until I see this over, and see what other order is required.

[At 10.52 a. m.] The wife of one of the jurors has sent a parcel of clothes for her husband's use. They are in the hands of the marshal, who has examined them to see whether there is anything improper in them, and he says there is nothing. I suppose there is no objection to allowing the package to be given to him.

Mr. BLISS. We have no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No objection on our part.

The COURT. [At 10.55 a. m.] I have a good deal of doubt in my mind in regard to the consequences of this occurrence. This man has been drinking a good deal; he is a hard drinker. During the progress of the trial, on one occasion, I took him aside and gave him a pretty sharp admonition, and he promised to abstain; but I have observed from his appearance for several days past that he has resumed his hard drinking. I suppose, being confined to the jury-room, and cut off from his supplies of that kind, it has resulted in this attack. I do not know what it is, whether mania a potu, or what; but he is not fit to be on the jury now. I suppose the doctor will give him a prescription that probably will be brandy or whisky.

Mr. BLACKMAR. He has given him some.

The COURT. Has he given him some?

Mr. DONALDSON. Yes, sir; he has given him two or three drinks.

Mr. MERRICK. I suppose whatever a doctor prescribes for the juror can be taken by him.

The COURT. Oh, undoubtedly. But attacks of this kind are apt to leave the mind in so shattered a condition as to create difficulty.

Dr. Z. T. SOWERS. He is all right now. If you wish it, you can have the jury come down now.

The COURT. Send for the jury again.

[At 11.03 a. m. the jury again came into the court-room. Their names were called by the clerk and they answered, all being present.]

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). If the court please, one of the jurors desires to ask a question of the court. To the most of us it seems to be a question of fact, but we felt that he should speak for himself. It is Mr. Horigan.

The COURT. The court will judge whether it be a question of fact or of law. If it is a question of fact the court will not answer it; but if it is one of law, the court will try to answer it. Mr. Horigan, will you state your difficulty?

Mr. HORIZAN. Your honor, I have one or two questions I want to ask. I want to know what date General Brady took the stumbling-block off the route from Tongue River to Fort Keogh?

The COURT. What is that?

Mr. HORIZAN. He stated on the stand that there was a stumbling-block in the way of making trips to pay the contractor. He said he expedited it, but there was a stumbling-block in the way. I want to know what date was that that he kicked the stumbling-block out of the way.

Another is, is it in this indictment where he made three trips additional where they had already expedited on another route?

The COURT. Those are questions of fact.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Questions of fact, your honor.

The COURT. There is no question of law involved in either of these inquiries of the juror. Gentlemen of the jury, now I shall take the liberty of saying a word to you. You have had a sick member of the jury with you, and a disagreeable occurrence happened this morning. He seems to be in a measure restored, and now I hope he will be able to perform his duties. I do not propose to discharge this jury very easily. It is the second time this case has been tried. I do not wish to put any undue stress upon your minds, but the court thinks that you ought to be able to agree upon a verdict of some kind. You may now retire.

Mr. CRANE. I would like to ask a question of the court. In case we should agree in regard to the guilt or innocence of any one of the parties, whether we can report it to the court?

The COURT. You must report your verdict as a whole.

Mr. CRANE. Some of the jury seem to want——

The COURT. [Interposing.] You have no right to say what some of the jury may have said.

Mr. CRANE. There is a doubt in their minds. My idea is that the first question to settle is whether there was a conspiracy. Some think——

The COURT. [Interposing.] Do not say what some think.

Mr. CRANE. We have not decided the question of conspiracy yet. Upon the question of the guilt or innocence——

The COURT. [Interposing.] These defendants must be convicted as they are indicted, one or more of them. The crime charged is conspiracy, followed by an overt act of one or more of them in pursuance of the conspiracy.

Mr. CRANE. Supposing we do not agree on conspiracy, can we vote in regard to the guilt or innocence of the parties?

The COURT. The court will not undertake to control you in the order in which you shall take the questions. Take the questions in any order you please, and agree upon any order you please. The court will not undertake to dictate to you how your discussions shall be conducted.

Mr. CRANE. Would it be proper for me to say whether we have agreed——

The COURT. [Interposing.] No, it would not be proper.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I understand that the only charge in this indictment is conspiracy. That is the offense charged.

Mr. MERRICK. As I understand, may it please your honor, in addition to that, it is the province of the jury to vote guilty or not guilty.

at any period of their investigations, when they please; and they understand from your charge all that is embraced in that.

The COURT. My instruction to the jury is that you can decide on what is involved in this indictment, as to which you are to render a verdict, in any order you please and at any time you please. But when you render your verdict, it ought to be a complete verdict; not a verdict as to part of the charge in the indictment, but a verdict upon the full charge as it is contained and set out in the indictment. There are a great many things in an indictment that are regarded as surplusage, which the prosecution is not bound to prove. That I told you in the charge. There are two substantial questions in the indictment: One is the conspiracy, and upon that question you have a right to say whether all, or, if not all, who, of the defendants were concerned with Rerdell in that conspiracy. You may even say that there was only one. You have full control of that subject.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Or whether there was a conspiracy.

The COURT. I am going on to say. That is, if you decide that there was a conspiracy, then you must determine who were engaged in it. But that will not end your consideration, in order to a verdict. You must find that the conspiracy was followed by some overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy done by one or more of them. If you think there was even one overt act committed by any one of the defendants engaged in that conspiracy, then it is your duty to render a verdict of guilty as to the party so found, and that verdict covers the whole indictment—covers the conspiracy and the overt act, too. You cannot say that you find the conspiracy and no overt act. You cannot say that you find an overt act and no conspiracy. The verdict cannot be in that shape. Your verdict, if a verdict of guilty, must be a general verdict in that way. If not guilty, it of course will cover the whole ground.

Mr. CRANE. I wish to state that it is very hot in the room where we are kept. During the night we had the door open between us and a communicating room when we slept, but that is now closed and locked against us.

Mr. MERRICK. Let it be opened.

Mr. CRANE. I would also ask if we cannot take a walk in the park during the day for a little while. Our room is oppressively hot; there is no air there.

The COURT. What room is it?

Mr. DONALDSON. It is the grand-jury room.

Mr. FASSETT (deputy marshal). With windows on this side and windows on the other. It is the coolest room in the building under our control.

Mr. INGERSOLL. On our part we are willing that anything should be done for their comfort.

Mr. MERRICK. I think the two rooms had better be thrown into one, and there is no reason why they should not take a walk in the park under the charge of the bailiffs. I think that would be a great accommodation to them.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We have no objection whatever.

Mr. CRANE. I do not wish it considered that I am finding fault with the accommodations; they are very fine, indeed.

The COURT. I do not know but that I shall make a change by and by in that respect.

Mr. MERRICK. I speak only for the present.

The COURT. I remember I tried a case here once in which, for the third time, the jury failed to agree. They came into court and stated that they stood six to six, with no chance for an agreement. I instructed the marshal to administer the common law to them, and keep them without fire and lights or food until they rendered a verdict, and they came in with a verdict in half an hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRICK. It would be an unusual punishment to keep them without fire.

The COURT. For the present, however, we will treat you well.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Let them have the fire for the present. [Laughter.]

The COURT. [To the jury.] You may retire again, gentlemen. The sick juror can have one or two drinks a day, and if any other juror wants medicine [laughter] he can have it. But there is to be no bottle for general circulation.

Mr. FASSETT. No, sir; I will attend to that.

The COURT. When the jury have made up their minds upon a verdict you can send word to me and I will come.

Mr. DAVIDGE. To what hour shall we take a recess?

The COURT. I do not know that it is worth while to name any hour.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Shall we meet at some time to-morrow morning?

The COURT. We will take a recess until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, with the understanding that, in the mean time, if the jury should agree upon a verdict, and send me word, I will be here.

Thereupon (at 11 o'clock and 38 minutes a. m.) the court took a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning, with the understanding indicated above by the court.

AFTER RECESS.

(Ten o'clock a. m. Thursday, June 14, 1883.)

Present, counsel for the defendants.

The COURT. [To the crier.] You can ask that jury if they have any communication to make to the court.

Mr. DONALDSON. [At 10.06.] They say they have a communication to make, and that they will be down in a minute.

[The jury entered the court-room at 10.10 a. m. The clerk called the names of the jurors, and all answered as present.]

The COURT. Gentlemen of the jury, the court has sent to you for the purpose of inquiring whether you have any communication to make to the court this morning.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). We have. We have agreed upon a verdict.

The COURT. Are the jury all here?

Mr. DONALDSON. Yes, sir.

The CLERK. Gentlemen of the jury, how say you, are the defendants guilty or not guilty?

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). Not guilty. [Great applause.]

Mr. DONALDSON. Silence. Order in court.

Mr. DAVIDGE. [To the clerk.] Record the verdict.

The CLERK. Gentlemen of the jury, hear your verdict as recorded: Your foreman saith that the defendants, John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, Stephen W. Dorsey, Harvey M. Vaile, otherwise called H. M. Vaile, and Thomas J. Brady, are not guilty as indicted. So say you all?

[At this point Mr. Ker came into court.]

The COURT. Mr. Vernon, how are you this morning?

Mr. VERNON (a juror). All right, sir.

The COURT. [At 10.15 a. m.] I believe we have nothing further now for the jury to do during the term. The term is near its close. The court is about to discharge you finally. You have had a laborious task to perform in this case—a task, the weight of which probably but few juries have ever felt before. You have been more than six months engaged in the trial, during which period you have been obliged, in a great measure, to neglect your occupations. Although your verdict, of course, will create dissatisfaction with many, yet, having been selected according to the forms of law and sworn to perform your duty faithfully, the court will be bound to presume that you have done so. If you have done so, each one according to the dictates of his own conscience, that will be a satisfaction to you as long as you live. You are, therefore, discharged with the thanks of the court.

Thereupon (at 10 o'clock and 16 minutes a. m.) the proceedings of this court upon this case were adjourned sine die.

(A.) Route 34149. Kearney to Kent, Nebraska.

Advertisement of November 1, 1877, 125 miles, one trip a week, schedule 60 hours, 525; of John W. Dorsey & Co., inviting bids (13 A), 611.

Affidavits of:

French, Chas. H., sworn to March 2, 1881, that on February 2, 1881, and since, the mail was carried to Cedarville regularly whenever the weather would permit without endangering the life of the mail carrier or safety of the mails; that to supply Cedarville in winter the carrier is compelled to travel 16 miles off the main road (114 A, defense), 3346.

Argument, opening, of Mr. Bliss referring specifically to this route, 253, 258, 266, 278, 283, 309-310.

Of W. W. Ker for the prosecution, relating to this route, 4547-4561.

Of Jeremiah M. Wilson for the defense, relating to this route, 5124-5129.

Argument on the question of the admission of petition (2 A), there being a variance between the one offered and the one averred in the indictment as an overt act—

Of Mr. Ingersoll, 618-622;

Of Mr. Ker, 624-628;

Of Mr. Merrick, 628-632;

Of Mr. Henkle, 632-641;

As to the admission of parol evidence to prove the contents of lost letter—

Of Mr. Ingersoll, 813-816, 819-821;

Of Mr. Merrick, 816-819.

Certificates of—

Grey, L. B., assistant postmaster Fitzalon, March 23, 1881, that there is no regular road from Fitzalon to Cedarville; that during that winter it was impossible to go to Cedarville except by way of Loup City (114 A, defense), 3347.

Grimes, R. M., postmaster, Kearney, Nebr., April 18, 1881, that the failures in first quarter 1881 were caused by storms and bridges washed away (115 A, defense), 3347.

Rossiter, Alice C., postmistress, Loup City, March 22, 1881, that the mail has been carried to Cedarville and return whenever the same could be done without endangering the safety of the mails and the life of the carrier (114 A, defense), 3346.

Contract of John M. Peck with the United States, dated March 15, 1878, executed by Peck, May 11, 1878, sureties D. W. C. Wheeler and S. N. Hoyt, witnessed by A. E. Boone and George P. Fall, certified by J. M. Edmunds, pay $868, printed in full, 542-545.

Decisions of the court:

Requiring the prosecution in proving an order to put in all papers contained in the jacket upon which the order is indorsed, as also any papers shown to have passed through Brady's hands before he made the order, 571, 572, 591.

Refusing to admit parol evidence to prove contents of a lost letter, that proof of its loss is not sufficiently established, 821, 822.

Refusing to compel prosecution to show papers to defense before they are offered in evidence, 572, 595, 596.

That it is competent to show a combination between living and dead parties; also to show that a combination was formed in 1878, provided that the conspiracy then formed can be shown to have continued after May 20, 1879, 599, 600.

Admitting petition (2 A) to show a combination, but not as an overt act, 641-645.

Refusing to admit petitions and papers offered by the defense, that they were filed in the department subsequent to the date of the order as set out in the indictment, and that no action was based upon them, 3257, 3258.

Admitting letters and petitions, asking for increase to six trips, and upon which no order was made, which application was refused by Brady to one of the contractors who was a member of the alleged conspiracy, on the ground that it may throw some light on the motions of the Second Assistant, 3264, 3265.

Drafts drawn by John M. Peck on the Auditor, November 1, 1878, in favor of H. M. Vaile, covering pay from 4th quarter, 1878, to the 4th quarter, 1879, inc., witnessed by M. C. Rerdell and Harvey G. Gray (47 A, 50 A, 54 A, 57 A, and 60 A), 709-712; April 1, 1879, in favor of H. M. Vaile, covering pay for the 1st, 2d, and 3d quarters, 1880, and the 3d and 4th quarters, 1881 (63 A, 66 A, 67 A, 79 A, and 80 A), witnessed by M. C. Rerdell and Harvey G. Gray, 712-715; April 1, 1879, in favor of John R. Miner, for one month's extra pay in the 3d quarter, 1881, witnessed by L. R. Bacon and Harvey G. Gray (76 A), 714.

Drawn by the Citizens' National Bank in favor of C. H. French for subcontract pay (89 A to 97 A), 749, 750.

Exceptions to rulings admitting:

Contract of John M. Peck, that it is not the one averred in the indictment, 545; order of French, July 10, 1879, on jacket indorsed "Do this, Brady," 566; that there is a variance between the order and the averment in the indictment, 568; petition, "Schedule 13 hours," on the ground of variance, 569; oath of Peck (3 A) that the signature is not proven, 570, 571; order of French, March 8, 1879 (5 A), 575; that it was made by French, 576; subcontract (6 A), that the signature of Vaile is not proven, 576; letter of J. M. Peck, March 4, 1878 (8 A), that the signature is not proven, 581; letter of John M. Peck, February 2, 1879 (9 A), that the signature is not proven, 582; orders of Brady, May 3, and September 24, 1878 (10 A and 11 A), 589; refusal of court to hear argument after the case is decided, 602; letters of J. W. Dorsey & Co., John R. Miner, and J. M. Peck (13 A to 22 A, inclusive), 611; what witness (French) told J. W. Dorsey as to supply of Cedarville, 613, 696; petition (2 A) to prove combination, 644; statement of witness (French) as to what he did with petition, in the absence of the defendants, 646; evidence to prove petitions defective in any other particular than that charged in the indictment, 651; remarks of court, 655; question whether witness ever received any pay from the defendants for increased speed, 655; letters of John R. Miner) 23 A to 33 A, inclusive), 661; that they do not tend to prove the issue and that Miner is the only defendant that had any connection with them, 663; letters signed John M. Peck, contractor, John R. Miner, agent, and John M. Peck, by John R. Miner, attorney (34 A to 38 A), that the handwriting is not sufficiently proved, 668; remarks of the court, 694; letters signed John M. Peck and John M. Peck, M. (39 A to 42 A, inclusive), 695; to decision overruling motion to strike what the court has said from the record, 697; of question as to how paper got defaced, 698; reports and warrants on the ground of variance and immateriality, 706, 708, 710, 712, 714, 715; certified transcript of revenues, 719; receipts for warrants, as immaterial, 723; tabulated statement of payments, 724; evidence tending to prove what proportion of the business done at Kearney post-office pertained to route 34149, 739; excluding papers offered by the defense and filed in the department subsequent to the order, as set out in the indictment, 3258, 3259; papers afterwards admitted, 3264, 3265.

Fines and deductions, statement of, 726.

Brady, Thomas J.—Continued.

petition asks for it, and Senator Saunders and Mr. Valentine recommended it, 3404; probably took the time, 13 hours, from Brewer's statement on the jacket, 3550; does not know how it happened that the only papers that spoke of expedition was the altered paper (2 A, 568), "schedule 13 hours," and the oath (3 A, 571), and offer of the contractors (9 A, 582), 3550; his attention was not attracted by the fact that the oath was made by J. M. Peck at Chico, N. Mex., February 1, 1879, and filed in the department April 3, 1879, at the same time, with the offer of the contractor, which was dated Washington, February 2, 1879, 3550; does not know that it occurred to him that he could have made it 6 trips a week at the old rate of speed, and it would have cost $935.42 less than he paid for 2 trips and expedition; fast 3-trip service might be better than a slow service 6 times a week, 3404; or that it was brought to his attention that he gained nothing by expedition in the connections at either end of the route, 3404; or that he considered the fact that, excluding the terminal offices, the entire revenues of the route were but $227.48, 3404; the revenues of offices like Kearney and Kent were a poor criterion of the value of the service, 3404; understood the figures on jacket (1 A, 566-567) to indicate the revenues, 3405; the personal importunity of Senator Saunders and Mr. Valentine had more to do with it than anything else, 3405; possibly he was not in an increasing mood the day when Senator Saunders sought an increase to 6 trips, 3406; witness made the order (10 A, 589) to embrace Fitzalon from July 1, 1878, and the order of September 24, 1878 (11 A, 589-590), to allow contractor $112.24 for 15 miles increase from July 21, 1878, these are merely pro forma orders, the office having been added to the route, and it being discovered subsequently that the distance was increased 15 miles, the order made in September to antedate the pay to July 1 was a thing the contractor was entitled to, although the statute says "no compensation shall be paid for any additional regular service rendered before the issuance of such order"; that was the practice of the department, 3551; never wrote to any postmaster instructing him not to use the mail bills; matters in the inspection division were left almost entirely to Lake, who had a microscopic vision for making deductions and imposing fines, 3400.

Brewer, George J., testimony of, 555-564, 581, 582, 751, 752; identifies handwriting to the files, 555-559; delivered files to Mr. Woodward, 560; papers were sometimes added to a jacket after it had reached the table of the Second Assistant, 564; custom as to addressing communications to contractors and subcontractors, 581, 582; identifies letter as in the handwriting of Vaile, 751.

French, C. H., testimony of, 597-615, 646-658, 747, 748; as to his subcontract with John W. Dorsey, 597, 598, 602, 603; sketch map, 608; route traveled, 608; men and animals, 609-658; made the trip, Kearney to Loup City, in twelve hours, 608, 609; one trip, Kearney to Loup City, drove himself and used 3 horses, and a boy to go to Cedarville, 3 trips, used 3 more horses, 609; Fitzalon did not add to the distance, 609; received his pay from John M. Peck, through John R. Miner, 610, 691, 692; subcontract pay, 610, 689-691; identifies letters, 610, 658-661, 667, 668; supply of Cedarville, struck out, 613-615; words "schedule thirteen hours" not in petition when witness signed it, 651; gave petition to Nightingale, 652; was not inquired of by defendants as to the number of men and horses, 652; received no pay for expediting, 655; distances, 655, 656, 673, 674, 687, 690, 693; population, 656, 657; quantity of mail, 657, 658; passengers and express, 658; petition (2 A) was copied from one received from John R. Miner, 647, 648; supply of Cedarville and Fitzalon, 676-687; schedule time, 687; commenced to address his communications to Vaile, Miner & Co. about July, 1879, 689; petition (2 A), 691; conversation with John W. Dorsey as to the supply of Cedarville, 696, 697; identifies his indorsement on drafts, 747, 748.

Grimes, Ralph M., postmaster at Kearney, testimony of, 609-704, 739-741, 752-754, 808-812, 822, 823; mail was always carried from Kearney to Loup City in about twelve hours, 700; there was no change in the time after the increase to three trips, 700; distances, 700, 701; notice of the increase of service, 700, 701; character of the roads, 702, 703; distance circulars, 703; about one-sixth of the mail leaving Kearney office went over route 34149, 739; weight of the mail, 740; revenues defined, 740, 741; lost letter ordering discontinuance of mail bills, 752, 753; ceased to send mail bills to the department after receipt of letter, 754; searched the place where he usually kept his letters, 811; manner in which he filed his letters, 822, 823; evidence as to lost letter withdrawn from the jury by the court, 823.

Witnesses:

Boone, A. E., mail contractor, testimony of, relating to this route.

Handwriting:

8 R. Oath of Vaile (1905) all written by Miner; except signature of Vaile, which is genuine, 2700.

10 R. Petition (1905) was written by Miner, 2700.

Brady, Thos. J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route.

Judge Kidder lived at Vermillion and was anxious for a daily mail, and as the contractors were losing money, to make it daily would make them lose more, so witness expedited the route to help the contractors a little, 3396; Bennett succeeded Kidder and wanted the same thing done some other place. He suggested that they cut down this route and witness refused, 3396. Identifies his indorsement "write Judge B. that it cannot be done" on petition (16 R. 1907) for extension of schedule; petition asked for two hours more running time than the original contract called for, that could not be done under the law, 3396; witness gave the order, but Brewer gave the reason, in the letter to Bennett (1939) declining to extend the schedule, that it would be an injustice to competing bidders, 3583; does not know that the distance was 75 miles, though advertised as only 50, or remember to have seen distance circular (6 R. 1902) stating the distance at 73 miles, or letter of Boynton (13 R. 1906) received January 14, 1878, stating the distance was 75 miles and that bidders would bid on the basis of 50 miles, this letter was sent to the Department after the advertisement was printed, 3555, 3556; it is the corresponding clerk's duty to arrange all matters of schedule, 3556; the order for expedition (7 R. 1904) on which the distance is stated as 75 miles, though advertised as 50, was made by French, but on jacket indorsed "Do this Brady," 3557.

Brewer, George J., corresponding clerk contract office, testimony of, 1879-1881, 1928-1933; identifies files, 1879-1880; notified Brady that the oath or the subcontractor instead of the contractor was filed, 1881; identifies copy of circular filled up by himself and signed Thos. J. Brady, 1928-1929; did not see Brady sign the circular, 1930; all circulars addressed to officials or covering an amount of money are signed; to the others a messenger attaches a fac-simile stamp, 1931; circulars addressed Delegate in Congress, under the practice of the office, were signed by Brady, 1933.

Leech, William A., subcontractor, testimony of, 1909-1917; made a contract with Williamson as agent, for Dorsey, in October, 1878; carried the mail to the middle of February, 1880, 1909; commenced carrying the mail one trip, 14-hour schedule, seventy-five miles, 1909; time was reduced to ten hours August 1, 1879, 1910; there were ten offices on the route, and a detention of 7 minutes to each office, 1910; 1 trip, 14-hour schedule, used a driver and 4 horses, 6 trips, 2 carriers and 15 horses, 1910; 3 trips, 14-hour schedule, 1 driver and 8 horses would be necessary, 1910, 1914; 3 trips a week, on a 10-hour schedule, 1 driver and 10 horses would be necessary, 1910, 1914, 1915; Brighton was always on the route, 1910; location of Kidder post-office was changed so as to make the distance 5 miles shorter, 1910; population of Sioux Falls, 3,000, Vermillion, 1,500 to 2,000, 1910; distance circular (6 R. 1902) submitted to jury by defense, 1912; Brighton, 1912-1913; mail connections, 1913-1914; men and animals, 1914, 1916; received his pay from Dorsey, corresponded with Miner, 1917.

Millie, Alexander, mail-carrier, testimony of, 1917-1924; carried the mail from Kidder to Sioux Falls, about 35 miles, for Leech, 1917; carried the mail 2 trips, afterwards 6 trips, 1917; 2 trips used 1 carrier and 1 horse for half the route, 1918; 6 trips drove himself and used 6 horses, 1918; men and animals, 1920-1921, 1923-1924; carried passengers, 1918; mail consisted sometimes of a postal card, and sometimes from 3 to 5 letters and papers, 1918; quantity of mail, 1921; mail arrived in Sioux Falls at 5 p. m.; left Sioux Falls for north and west at 7 a. m.; going east on railroad at 1 p. m., 1919.

Witnesses—Continued.

Witness and Vaile took this route in the division, 4207.

Nichols, Adelbert P., mail-carrier, testimony of, 1924–1928; carried the mail from Vermillion to Kidder, about 35 miles, from August 1, 1879, until the middle of February, 1880, 6 trips, 1924; there were 8 post-offices, including Vermillion and Kidder, 1924; mail from Vermillion would average about 10 or 13 pounds, 1925; from Kidder the mail was much lighter, 1925; mail arrived at Vermillion at 5 p. m., 1925; mail left Vermillion going east 9.30 a. m.; going west at 4 p. m.; carried passengers, 1925; when he drove single, he used 4 horses; double, he used 8 horses; drove himself, 1926; largest mail was from 15 to 20 pounds, smallest, a postal card, 1926; men and animals, 1926–1928.

Prior, John H., clerk contract office, testimony of, 1899–1901, 1933–1936; produces book containing memorandum of circular to G. G. Bennett, 1899; identifies paper as a copy of the entry in the book, 1900; signature was written, 1901; manuscript of circulars is recorded in book, 1933; practice of the office as to circulars, 1934–1936.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route.

Handwriting:

2 R. Proposal of Dorsey (553, 1899); body was written by Miner; amount "398" filled in by witness; signature, J. W. Dorsey, genuine, 2349.

8 R. Oath of Vaile (1905); all except the signatures written by Miner; genuine signature of Vaile, 2349.

10 R. Petition (1905); body was written by Miner, 2349.

15 R. Subcontract of Vaile (1906–1907); all written by Miner, except signature of Vaile, which is genuine, 2349.

Shaw, Calvin G., postmaster Vermillion; testimony of, 1928, 1936–1942; sent petition for extension of schedule to G. G. Bennett, Delegate; received a reply through Mr. Bennett, signed Thos. J. Brady; reply was lost, 1928; by the flood in April, 1881, 1936–1937; reply stated that "request of petitioners could not be granted, for the reason that it would do injustice to competing bidders," 1939; received lost letter in response to petition sent to Judge Bennett, 1941; got up petition (16 R, 1907) of his own volition, 1942; did not administer an oath to Vaile as subcontractor, 1942.

Sleman, John B., Chief Pay Division, testimony of, 1903; produces reports, drafts, and warrants, 1903.

Snyder, Frank M., mail-carrier; testimony of, 1946; carried the mail from Vermillion to Worthing, 55 miles, in 8 hours; 3 trips, used 1 driver and 3 horses, 1946; time was extended to 12 hours July 1, 1881 (stricken out), 1946.

Vaile, Harvey M., one of the defendants; testimony of, relating to this route. Witness and Miner got this route in the division, 4020; made the affidavit (8 R. 1905), 4030; had never been on this route, 4067; did not know how many men and animals were in fact being used, 4068; conversation with Brewer as to making an affidavit as subcontractor, 4030; had no conversation with Brady upon that subject, 4030; made the affidavit upon the advertised distance of 50 miles, 4030, 4031, 4068; the route being 73 miles could not be properly run in ten hours, 4071; the reason that he did not get an affidavit from John W. Dorsey, 4069; had nothing to do with procuring petitions for increase of service and expedition to ten hours, or with the disallowance of petition of postmasters for extension of schedule to 16 hours, 4031; identifies his signature to subcontract (15R. 1906, 1907), 4070.

- Kidder, J. P., to Key, H. R., March 1, 1878; large settlements in the Yellowstone as well as the military are justly entitled to daily mail; indorsed and recommended by Martin Maginnis (35 T), 2150.
- Loundsberry, C. A., postmaster, Bismarck, to Brady, July 19, 1878; when the route is established time should be reduced to at least 65 hours; the service proposed will cost less than the War Department paid last year for carriers from Tongue River to telegraphic points (17 T), 2141-2142. To Superintendent Railway Mail Service, Chicago, October 18, 1878; all mail from points east of the Mississippi for Tongue River and the Yellowstone should be sent by Bismarck by so doing 300 miles of staging, 500 miles of railroad, and much time will be saved (26 T), 2145. To Brady, no date; referring to schedule prepared by department, states that Sunday instead of Monday should be fixed as the date of departure; that the mail arrives from the east at 7 a. m. Sunday, but none on Monday (49 T), 2154. To Brady, January 1, 1879, reports that tri-weekly service on a 65-hour schedule was commenced on that day (210 T, defense), 3302; March 15, 1879, as to cause of delays and failures in first quarter, 1879 (73 T, defense), 2872; August 23, 1879, as to wet and dam-

Maginnis, Martin, Delegate, to Second Assistant, July 23, 1878; once-a-week service on a long schedule will not be of much use; tri-weekly service on a 65-hour schedule should be put on at once (14 T), 2141.

Miles, General Nelson A., to Postmaster-General, July 28, 1878; recommends increase to three or six trips; aside from the military necessities the settlements are increasing rapidly; much mail matter is now carried over the Union Pacific by Bozeman; the whole Territory will be benefited by the more direct and short route to Bismarck; indorsed by James E. White, Superintendent R. M. S. (25 T), 2144. Copy of letter to Postmaster-General, December 4, 1878, requesting increase to tri-weekly or daily mail; that the military post at Forts Keogh and Custer, garrisoned by about 1,500 troops, and at least 1,000 settlers in the Yellowstone, are dependent principally upon this route; indorsed and recommended by General Alfred H. Terry; referred through Wm. D. Whipple and E. D. Townsend (30 T), 2146-2147.

Miner, John R., B., to Brady asking discontinuance of the route, and stating that there are no offices between Bismarck and Tongue River, which latter office is supplied from Fort Buford; that the distance is 350 instead of 250 miles, as advertised; that the country is occupied by hostile Indians, and that no mail can be carried, except with a large military escort; indorsed by Brady, June 25, 1878, "Judge Kidder presents this with the statement that he has reason to believe that the facts set forth are correct" (5 T), 2137, 2138; October 4, 1878, will carry the mail two additional trips on a schedule of 65 hours for $32,650 (11 T), 2139; and Vaile to Brady, February 3, 1879, refiling subcontract (47 T), 2153; January 29, 1879, requesting withdrawal of subcontract (41 T), 2152.

Telegrams of:

C. A. Loundsbury to Brady, January 5, 1880, regarding Keogh service whole (what 2200) shall be regarded failure, impossible to perform in winter on present schedule, could probably secure 6 days' service, received December 6, 1880 (48 T), 2153-2154.

From Brady to postmaster, December 4, 1881, report by telegram the extent and cause of delayed mails on Bismarck and Miles City route (50 T, defense), 2198; no date; in case of absolute failure employ temporary service at not to exceed $6,900 per annum (51 T, defense), 2200.

Williamson, L. P., to Miner, April 5, 1881: Dispatch from Fort Keogh not correct; river is full of floating ice; ferry-boats all washed away and sunk (207 T, defense), 3301.

Whistler, commanding, to P. M. Gen'l James, Fort Keogh, March 27, 188-, reports gross irregularity of mail service for the past four months; we have not received an average of two mails a week; military necessity requires that the contract for six times a week should be properly fulfilled. Indorsed: March 28, 1881. "Brewer: Telegraph contractor that this service must be put in first-class order immediately, or he will be declared a failing contractor. Brady." (206 T, defense), 3301.

Warrants, in favor of Vaile and Miner, those for first, second, and third quarters, 1881, being signed by Thomas L. James, Postmaster-General, 2650-2651.

Witnesses:

Barnes, Wilbur A., mail carrier, testimony of, 2171-2173; carried the mail from January 1 to April, 1879; there were then 18 serviceable horses on the route, 2171; made three round trips, took from 7 to 9 days each way, afterwards drove from Powder Horn to Miles City, 2171; there were 8 carriers when he was driving; twice he overtook the other carriers, 2172; mail to Miles City would weigh from 50 to 250 pounds, to Bismarck it was very light, 2172.

Boone, A. E., mail contractor, testimony of, relating to this route, 2172.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; thinks this route was made a post-route in the winter of 1876-7; does not know how it came to be advertised at once a week; his attention was first called to it some time in 1878 by General Miles, who wanted a more frequent mail service directly to the mouth of the Tongue River; as it was, the mail had to go around by Ogden, Helena, and Bozeman, 3397; they determined to increase it, but how to do it at the ridiculous figure it had been taken by the contractor was a stumbling block, 3397; besides, the schedule was too slow; believed the service was needed and increased it; even then it was not a very expensive service; a good service, running night and day, was worth from $25 to $35 a mile; this service cost $37.63 per mile, 3397; does not know whether by expedition it could have been transformed into a profitable contract, 3451; they preferred to help the contractors rather than crush them, 3452; it tended to make a more efficient service to make it three trips, and much more efficient to make it fast service; that could not be done with any regard to the rights and safety of the contractors at the price they had originally bid, 3452; it was bid off at $2,350; the distance was misstated, and to require the contractors to perform three-times-a-week service at that figure would have been ruinous to them, and the only way to do was to increase and expedite it and pay the contractor something near what it would actually cost him, 3452, 3453; if the contract was a losing one, for one trip, at $2,350, the question whether it became a gaining one by multiplying that sum by three and making three trips is one for the contractor; witness would not want to undertake it at that price, 3453; if the allowance for expedition is to be gauged by the number of men and horses used on the one service and the number of men and horses that would be used on the other service, the question as to how he would in that way convert a losing service at one trip and slow time into a profitable service at three trips and fast time if he did not make an allowance in excess of the amount authorized under the statute is a matter the contractor could tell much more about—in some way he came to the conclusion they benefited the contractors more or less in that way, 3453; thinks he examined the affidavit (12 P. T., 2140), but did not enter into any calculation as to the speed required of each horse; examined simply as to the cost of service under the expedited pay per mile, 3440; when Miner swore that it would take 150 men to make the expedited time, witness assumed it was correct, 3430; it was a brand new route; they had to do everything—buy and store everything for the coming winter, and build their stations; all that is included in the law; there was no absurd results in the affidavits, 3430; as the route was a new one, running through the bad lands of Dakota, which were infested by Indians, 150 men did not seem an unnecessary number; but while they accepted the affidavit, they did not make the expedition upon that basis, 3442; pro rata would have been some $77,000, 3443; thinks he stated to the contractor emphatically that it could not be expedited upon any such basis, 3443; the oath and the proposition seem to have been filed on the same day, 3443; that shows how they expedited business, 3443; but if the jacket was made on October 4, and the order not until December, they did not get along as rapidly as he thought, 3443; it would seem that the oath was filed at one time and the proposition at a later time during the day, 3444; does not remember the statement that it would take 12 men on existing schedule and 150 men on a schedule of 65 hours attracted any attention, 3448; order (10 T, 2139) and the oath (12 T, 2140) are the papers that show that the order was less than pro rata, 3469; the oath referred to on jacket (27 T, 2145) upon which the pro rata for expedition would have been $26,884 instead of $27,950, as allowed, was never considered or acted upon, 3470; there being on file one affidavit of Miner specifying the existing number was 12 men and 13 animals, and that the number needed was 150 men and 150 animals, and another affidavit specified that the existing number was 11 men and 12 animals, and the number needed was but 37 men and 73 animals, witness cannot say why the later affidavit was not acted upon, 3471; he made the order to expedite to 65 hours (10 T, 2139), first adding to the $2,350, $35,000, and then adding 3 trips more, making a total of $70,000, for the purpose of getting good service, 3453; does not remember that the contractor sought to be relieved of the contract, 3540, 3453-3554; identifies his indorsement on letter of Miner "B" (5 T, 2137-2138), asking for the discontinuance of the route to the effect that it was filed by Judge Kidder, who stated that he had reason to believe that the facts set forth were correct, 3453-3454; does not remember why he did not make a temporary contract and advertise in the miscellaneous letting, thus throwing the matter open to public bidding, instead of making the order for increase and expedition; probably could not have gotten anybody to take the temporary contract for 6 months for such a route, 3454; he could not have allowed the service to have gone along on the existing contract, and then have advertised in the miscellaneous advertisement and have done what he wanted to do, 3454; it was the policy of the Department at that time to do things in that way, and not to abolish a route simply for the purpose of getting temporary service on it, 3540; the miscellaneous letting would have taken place in the fall of 1878, and it being a new route established over a bad country the price would have been probably far in excess of what it was under expedition, and scarce anybody would have undertaken to put service on at the commencement of the winter, 3454; he frequently made temporary contracts pending readvertisement; on routes as long as this one here they had a contractor bound for the service, and if they had thrown it open to public bidding they would have run the risk of having it taken too low, 3540; there was a greater risk of having it done on this route than the others, as it was a new route, and probably the most difficult one in the country; it was no newer than the Rock Creek and Fort Custer, but more difficult, 3540; does not remember that in many cases he made contracts for temporary service in the fall of 1878 upon routes as long as the Bismarck and Fort Keogh; or that he made a temporary contract from Watertown to Big Stone City, Dakota, 490 miles, or from Bijou Hills to Camp Robinson, 300 miles long; possibly he made one with Meserole in the fall of 1878 from Ouray to Salinas, 328 miles long, 3542; does not remember that he made a similar contract with A. H. Brown on the same route, except putting the distance at 347 miles, 3542; or that he put an advertisement of the Rock Creek and Fort Custer route, 340 miles long, into the miscellaneous letting of 1878, 3541; several important routes were not let in February, 1878, but were readvertised for the purpose of getting 3 additional trips for 3d and 4th class matter; thinks the Redding and Roseburg was one, 3541; and the route from Franklin to Helena, 495 miles, 7 trips, was another, 3542; the bond required on the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route was $2,500, and there was no change in the bond when the service was run up to $70,000; that was the only security, but they always have the power of recoupment, 3582; where there is a failure on an expedited or increased route it would probably be relet at the original trips and speed, in that case the bond would be good, 3582; the advertisement of this route contained a notice to contractors that they must inform themselves of the length of the route, 3456; and they would not, as a general rule, be entitled to additional pay for any increase over the advertised distance; the distance was properly stated in order to make schedule time, 3456; it would be right to extend the schedule time fixed in the contract, where it is clearly a misstatement of distance, and where the schedule has been based on the misstated distance, 3457; that would be permissible under the contract, and a just thing to do, 3457; if the distance proved shorter than advertised, they would not shorten the time without an additional allowance to the contractor, 3457.

Brewer, George J., corresponding clerk, testimony of, 2679-2680, 2082-2083; identifies files, 2083-2085; identifies jacket (27 T, 2145), 2679; when he made up the jacket he had the sworn statement referred to on the brief, 2680; "3 a. w." stands for three times a week.

Cable, Isaac, teamster, testimony of, 2663-2672; helped John W. Dorsey in building the ranches; when they were at Beaver Creek, the latter part of July, 1878, heard a conversation between him and Pennell; the men had made a kick for their pay, 2666; Dorsey said that they did not expect to make any money out of the contract at figures that they had it at that time; that they took these contracts low to keep out small bids, knowing that there would be an increase of service, 2666; that they would get the increase with the influence of his brother, Senator Dorsey; that there was a ring formed in Washington, and that if it was increased, as it was expected, their pay would be $150,000 at the end of the year, 2666-2667; witness had a conversation with J. W. Dorsey in August; Dorsey asked witness if he thought the men would sign a petition for a post-office on the west side of the Little Missouri, in order to make the road longer; at that time there was nobody living there, 2667; cross-examined, 2667-2672.

Witnesses—Continued.

Cole, John W., mail-carrier, testimony of, 2182-2188; kept Coal Bank Station about a month and a half, afterwards drove between Pennell and Powder River, 63 miles, 2182; and between Powder River and Keogh, about 40 miles, 2182-2183; commenced six trips' service August 16, 1879, 2183; between Pennell and Powder River, three trips, there were 8 horses and 2 carriers, between Powder River and Fort Keogh, six trips, there were 8 horses and 1 extra and 2 drivers, 2183; the Buford and the Bismarck mail went over the same route between Powder River and Keogh, both mails had the same carrier, 2183; failed to take the mail into Miles City some 6 or 8 times during the winter, they were ordered to wait at Powder River 12 hours, and if no mail came to run in, 2184; once, when he had two mails, left one at Miles City and took the other in, 2184; men and animals, 2185-2187.

Dorsey, John W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route: Arrangements for starting the service, building ranches and stocking this route, 4088-4089; this interview with General Miles at Fort Keogh, 4091-4092; denies conversation with Cole McLellan (2656-2658), 4093-4094, 4145-4146, and with Isaac Cable (2666), 4095, 4144-4145; testimony of Pennell (2157) as to conversation with witness is substantially true, 4096, 4147-4148; testimony of Loundsberry (2681) as to witness's statement in regard to side post with certain qualifications is substantially true, 4106, 4148-4149, identifies his letter to S. W. Dorsey (26X, 2239), 4131; his explanation of letter, 4131-4133; identifies signature to letter of Rerdell (27X, 2239); his explanation of letter, 4146-4147.

Dorsey, Stephen W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route: Remembers changing the amount to be bid in the bidding book on this route, 3875; knew that the Northern Pacific Railroad was about being constructed and the line would be increased, 3876; it was an easy country to run the mail through, except the bad lands, a little strip on the Little Missouri, 3876; there were no people there except at the terminal points, 3876; anybody who knew the country at that time knew that the route was bound to be increased, 3921; thinks C. B. Wright told him in the winter of 1878 that they were preparing to go ahead with the railroad, 3921; asked Rerdell to use his vacation in July, 1878, and go out and help J. W. Dorsey on this route; at that time J. W. Dorsey was in Minnesota, Peck was in New Mexico, Miner was in Denver, and Boone was here, 3920; furnished him with passes, letters of introduction, and put about $3,000 at his control, 3920, 3922; but does not recollect the instructions that he gave him, 3922; or that he told him the route was to be increased and expedited, 3922; or whether he gave him any instructions as to building ranches and getting up petitions, 3920, 3922; does not know whether J. W. Dorsey & Co. had an account at the German American National Bank; witness took Rerdell to that bank and told them he was authorized to draw this money by signing J. W. Dorsey & Co.'s name; believes that Rerdell left his signature there, 3923; witness furnished the money and authorized himself to permit Rerdell to sign their name on their bank account, 3923; Rerdell might have to use the money before he saw J. W. Dorsey; thinks there was some talk about getting grain, 3924; did not tell Rerdell to have a post-office established out there, 3924; does not know that Miner or Boone asked to be relieved of the contract on the ground that it was not needed, 3921.

Lambert, Howard T., mail-carrier, testimony of, 2173-2182; carried the mail from January 3 to May 20, 1879, made two round trips, took from 8 to 10 days each way, 2173-2174; mail towards Bismarck weighed from 30 to 40 pounds, the other way he had two sacks, 2174; there were 22 serviceable horses, one pair of mules, and 2 or 3 cripples on the route, and 8 drivers, 2174; afterwards there was a pair of horses and from 22 to 23 mules added, 2174; there were no intermediate post-offices, 2174; afterwards drove from Pennell to Powder River, 63 miles, there were 8 horses and 1 other driver on that portion of the route, 2175; John W. Dorsey told witness in September, 1878, that he expected to have the route expedited, 2175, 2178-2179; in January, 1879, Dorsey told witness that his brother would have everything on there and make a good road of it, 2175, 2179-2181; Fort Buford mail ran over the same route from Powder River to Fort Keogh, witness carried both mails, 2176; once he overtook another carrier and carried both mails into Bismarck, 2176; men and animals, 2177.

Loundsberry, C. A., postmaster, Bismarck, Dak., testimony of, 2188-2202, 2681-2683; has been postmaster since April, 1876; the mail left Bismarck on the 1st, 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th of July, 1878, and arrived on the 19th, 22d, and 26th of

Miner, John R., one of the defendants; testimony of, relating to this route; witness and Vaile took this route in the division, 4207; witness was the contractor; this was a Dakota route and had been turned over to J. W. Dorsey and Boone in the summer of 1878, 4256-4257; as to contract between J. W. Dorsey and Boone, 4290; witness gave drafts in blank on this route, but the drafts were cut out by the sub-contracts and never paid, 4257-4258; has no knowledge of the $3,000 advanced by S. W. Dorsey to Rerdell, 4260.

12 (C?) T. Oath of Miner (2140); witness made the affidavit in good faith, 4192, 4289; his explanation of it, 4193, 4196-4198, 4265-4267; does not remember whether he testified before the Congressional committee to the extracts read to him relating to the oath, 4279-4281; witness had nothing to do with getting the expedition on this route; according to his best judgment there was a loss of $40,000 or $50,000 on this route, 4191, 4271; cost of the ranches and running the route, 4267-4269; books were kept on the route, 4269; when coaches were put on, 4269-4270; sale of stock, 4270; fines and remissions, 4271-4272, 4291-4292; Reedrill's testimony (2215); as to the reduced amounts in the bidding box is correct as to this route, 4176.

Pennell Joseph, Miles City, Mont., testimony of, 2154-2171; met John W. Dorsey in June and Rerdell in July, 1878; had charge of building the ranches; helped stock the route and start the mail, 2154; built 12 ranches, from 15 to 20 miles apart, 2154; there were 3 others built, making 15 in all, 2155; only every other ranch was used at first, 2155; there were no inhabitants between Lincoln, 4 miles out of Bismarck, and the Powder River, 2155; Rerdell told witness in Bismarck, that after they got west of the Little Missouri he would send out a petition for a post-office, 50 or 60 miles north of the main line, to be signed by the men, 2156; that the man who had the station nearest the place could be postmaster, 2156; when the mail was once a week there was about 25 head of stock and from 4 to 5 carriers on the route, 2156; J. W. Dorsey said they would need all the ranches on the increased service, and it would be cheaper to build them at once; they cost about $6,000, 2157; stock cost from $75 to $90 a head, 2157; Rerdell and the witness figured on the stock required for 3 trips on a shorter schedule; witness figures were 40 head of stock and 7 or 8 drivers; Rerdell's were about double, 2157; J. W. Dorsey wanted witness to take a half interest as witness had some stock, Dorsey to furnish the money and witness to build the ranches and take care of stock, 2157-2158; that they would have an increase to 3 trips on a shorter schedule inside of six months; that they would be allowed at least $25,000 for three trips, that there would be another increase to six trips within a year, and that he had a brother in Washington who had the influence to help him through, 2158; when the mail was once a week it averaged one small sack, 2159; stations, 2159, 2160, 2162; settlement of the country, 2160; employment by the government, 2161; conversation with J. W. Dorsey, 2161-2166, 2169, 2170; men and animals, 2162-2163; Indian troubles, 2163; passengers and express, 2163; route by which the mails went to Keogh before this road was built, 2167.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, 2218-2222, 2361, 2362; witness went West July 11, 1878, to assist in putting on service on this route, 2218; Senator Dorsey gave witness $1,500, and went with him to the German-American Bank where he placed $3,000 to the credit of John W. Dorsey & Co., and caused witness to sign the name of John W. Dorsey & Co. on the signature-book, 2218; never had any authority to sign the name of J. W. Dorsey & Co. except to draw the money out of the bank which was given him by S. W. Dorsey, 2221, 2408; met J. W. Dorsey in Saint Paul and went with him to Bismarck, where, with the assistance of Dorsey and Pennell, he bought the grain, materials to build the stations, cooking utensils, and provisions, 2219; paid for them through the house of J. W. Raymond & Co., drawing on the German-American Bank and signing the name of John W. Dorsey & Co., 2219, 2220; after witness' return from the West negotiated two or three notes signed John W. Dorsey & Co. and indorsed by S. W. Dorsey, the amounts were not in the notes, 2218; used all of the money given him by S. W. Dorsey, in building stations, buying grain, and paying freight bills for the Tongue River route, except a few hundred dollars turned over to Miner and Vaile in the fall; used about $8,000 for this purpose, 2219; S. W. Dorsey furnished witness with the blanks, gave him a draft of what he wanted, and instructed him to arrange for a post-office off the line of the route, so as to increase the distance about 60 miles, and told him to get the men employed on the line to sign an application, 2219; witness filled up an application and gave it to Pennell to

- Hugus, W. B., postmaster at White River, to Eugene Taylor, February 9, 1880, no officer or citizen here has ever taken back anything they subscribed to in your petition; they are more incensed than ever at the miserable management of the mail since you quit carrying it. The quartermaster puts on a weekly buck board to-day, and a weekly carrier line on Wednesday (81 S, defense), 3143; to Brady, February 21, 1880, refers to 2 mail bills inclosed, and states that both mails were received in the same pouch; sometimes 3 mails from Rawlins are held at Snake River and forwarded in one pouch; asks if he should sign both bills (101 S, defense), 3150; March 6, 1880, acknowledges letter of February 26; the mails from there to Snake River have not been on time; the mail received that day is the only one delivered in nine days, and was 32 hours behind; the military here have a courier line to Snake River 3 times a week; Alexander Robb, a drunken driver, who makes the affidavit (83 S, defense), 3144, 3145.
- James, Thomas L., to Brady, April 9, 1881; referring to conversation respecting expedition of route 31509, and other routes, and directing Brady not to issue the final orders until he has further examined them, 3382.
- Lithgon, W., to Steele, September 28, 1879; was late one trip caused by the carrier getting lost; the other failures were caused by the other carriers being late; soldiers going in and the Indians preparing to fight (55 S, defense), 3132.
- Meeker, N. C., Indian Agent, to Key, August 17, 1879; calls attention to the irregular and unsatisfactory mail service (56 S, defense), 3133.
- Pater, John F., postmaster at Baggs, to Rerdell, February 4, 1880; states the mail was too heavy to carry on snow shoes, and could not have been carried in 45 hours, had not the road been repeatedly broken by government trains; has given entire attention to getting the mail through as fast as possible (79 S, defense), 3142.
- Perkin, C. F., to Rerdell, May 21, 1878: to run in 45 hours it will take double the stock; if he runs in that way expect to get $10,200 (37 S, defense), 1999.
- Post, W. H., postmaster, White River, to Second Assistant; no date; almost impossible for carriers to get through on schedule time; suggests that the schedule, which is five days, be increased to six during the winter (35 S), 1964.
- Rerdell, M. C., to Eugene Taylor, February 8, 1881, copy of letter, asking him to get up petitions for six or seven times a week, and stating he can get the increase; this must be done so he can get them by March 1, 1874, 2077; March, 1881, acknowledging receipt of petitions, and stating that department has ordered an increase to 7 trips; that Judge Lilley says 6 miles additional will be allowed for Dixon, and that Taylor's pay will be $23,333.33 (41 S), 2072.
- Steele, John W., to Rerdell, January 3, 1880, relative to difficulties in getting the mail carried. Foote and Dalton have the line from Rawlins to Snake River, running all right; they have 10 men and 24 horses; has ordered them to push the mail regardless of cost, but no one can make it in 45 hours as long as the snow is in present condition; cannot let the contract again this winter for less than $20,000 (82 S, defense), 3143–3144. To Lieutenant Scott, January 15, 1880, asking condition of roads, whether the mail is running with regularity; indorsed by Lieutenant Scott; the carrier line was discontinued January 7, 1880, since when he has been transmitting quartermaster business through the mail; roads are very, very bad, on account of deep snow; under the circumstances the mail is running with commendable regularity and expedition (80 S, defense), 3143. To Captain Clifford, January 16, 1880, asking condition of roads between Rawlins and White River, indorsed by W. Clifford, captain of Steele, John W.—Continued.

Infantry, January 16, 1880: The road between Rawlins and White River is impassable for wagons; the writer left Rawlins with twenty-four men December 20, 1879, and the same train reached Snake River, sixty-five miles, in twenty-two days; cost of wheeling is 25 per cent. in excess of work on runners (76 S, defense), 3141. To Lieutenant McCauley, February 5, 1880, asks information as to the difficulties encountered in maintaining the courier line, indorsed Fort Steele, February 11, 1880: "While fast time may be often maintained, it is constantly impossible for the whole route, owing to the condition of the road and blinding snow storms" (84 S, defense), 3145, 3146.

Wright, John A., by G. W. Lancaster, attorney, concurred in by John W. Dorsey M to Brady, December 3, 1878, requesting withdrawal of subcontract (10 S), 1955.

Mail bills showing departure of each mail from:

Meeker and arrivals at Rawlins first quarter, 1881 (161 to 184 S, defense), 3167-3168.

Warrants (not read), 2085.

Witnesses:

Adams, John G., county clerk, testimony of, 2006–2008; received a letter from Eugene Taylor in February, 1881, purporting to be signed by M. C. Rerdell; destroyed the letter; it directed Taylor to have petitions circulated, and personal letters written to the Postmaster-General, asking increase of service, and that the papers be sent in before March 1, 2006; witness circulated a petition which the officers refused to sign, 2007; had a conversation with Rerdell about April 1, 1879; Rerdell handed him a draft of a letter he had written, and asked witness if he would copy it and send it to the department; witness refused; afterwards, Rerdell came in with Rankin and Hayes, who asked him to write the letter, and he did so, 2007. Identifies (29 S, 1962–1963), as the letter written at the time; the letter was a copy of the one drafted by Rerdell, 2008.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; the reason why he did not increase this route to 6 trips, instead of adding 2 trips and expediting the time to 45 hours and saving the Government $3,406.25, was that they wanted 3 trips a week and expedition, and that Mr. Teller, Senator Chaffee, and others recommended it; 3 trips upon a 45-hour schedule would be a far better service than 6 trips on a very long schedule, 3406–3407; he took the 45-hour schedule in order to make it about 4 miles an hour; did not follow either the petitions or recommendations of Representatives and Senators; did as he pleased about it as he had a right to do under the law, 3407; before he made the order for expedition does not remember to have seen letter from the postmaster at White River, (35 S, 1964), recommending a schedule of 6 days in winter and 5 days in summer, 3407–3408; it would have had little weight, 3409; when a letter or petition spoke of days he interpreted it as a day of 12 hours, 3408; does not remember any recommendation for less than 80 hours, that would have been no expedition, 3409; knew when he made the expedition for 45 hours that there was no continuation of the service beyond White River; it was gotten up principally for that Indian post, 3411; did not know that by the expedited schedule the mail arrived at Rawlins two hours after the mail east and west had left, 3411; it was the corresponding clerk's duty to fix the schedule upon the recommendation of the postmasters at the terminal offices and the contractors if they can agree, 3411-3412; the orders are then signed by the Second Assistant, pro forma; cannot say whether the affidavit of Perkins, subcontractor (24 S, 1960-1961), was the one upon which he made the order of May 1, 1879 (22 S, 1957-1958), for expedition; jacket simply says, "subcontractor makes statement"; does not know that the subcontractor's affidavit is on a schedule of 84 hours, 3438; identifies communication sent to the investigating committee, on page 512 of the book headed "Post-Office Deficiencies, Star Service," inclosing affidavit of Perkins (24 S, 1960-1961), 3542-3543. Referring to the testimony of Thomas L. James in regard to a conversation had with witness about March 8 or 9, 1881, witness had a conversation with regard to the general policy of the department, called out by a letter from James, in which, probably, the conversation occurred referred to in his testimony, 3381-3382. Produces letter from James, dated April 9, 1881, respecting the expedition of route 31509, 3382; from receipt of this letter witness had a conversation with James in which witness sneeringly referred to a sudden conversion to economical ideas, 3382; possibly he may have had a conversation in relation to the Rawlins and White River route; witness remembers distinctly telling James that if these orders were to be revoked he wanted it in writing, 3384.

Boone, A. E., mail contractor, testimony of, relating to this route, 2700-2702.

4 S. Letter of John W. Dorsey (1952) was all written by Rerdell, 2700.

6 S. Subcontract of John A. Wright (1954), signature of J. W. Dorsey genuine, 2701.

10 S. Letter of John A. Wright and J. W. Dorsey, M. (1955), signature of J. W. Dorsey written by Miner, 2701.

14 S. Letter of J. W. Dorsey and M. C. Rerdell (1956) all written by Miner, except the signature of Rerdell, which is genuine, 2701.

16 S. Subcontract of S. W. Dorsey (1956), signatures of S. W. and J. W. Dorsey are genuine, 2701.

24 S. Oath of Perkins (1960-1961), body written by Rerdell, 2701.

25 S. Oath of J. W. Dorsey (1961), body written by Kellogg, except the figures "38113" and the words "three," "four," and "twelve;" figures "45," the word "three," and figures "11" and "32," which he thinks were filled in by S. W. Dorsey. The signature is that of J. W. Dorsey, 2701.

26 S, 27 S, and 28 S. Petitions (1961-1962), written by Rerdell, 2702.

30 S. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1963), signature and all written by S. W. Dorsey, 2702.

Dalton, George B., subcontractor, testimony of, 2077-2081. Witness carried the mail from January 6 to June 30, 1880, under a contract made with J. W. Steele, as the agent of J. W. Dorsey, 2077, 2078. Identifies subcontract (42 S), 2078; carried the mail 3 trips, schedule 45 hours, used 9 carriers and 20 horses, 2078; carried passengers and express, 2078; average mail was from 2 to 5 sacks, 2078; Baggs was the only intermediate post-office, 2078; left Rawlins at 9 a. m., and arrived at White River from 11 p. m. to 6 a. m., left White River at 9 a. m. and arrived at Rawlins from 6 p. m. to 9 p. m., 2078-2079. There were 5 or 6 companies at Snake River after the Ute outbreak, 2079. Did not file his subcontract, 2079. Men and animals, 2080.

Davis, John C., agent for stage line; testimony of, 1989-1990. Received and opened a letter addressed to Taylor, received about the middle of February, 1881, and purporting to be signed by M. C. Rerdell, gave the letter to Taylor, 1989; witness and Taylor circulated a petition, 1989.

Dorsey, John W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route 25 S. (1961); oath of John W. Dorsey; it is witness' signature; the reason witness made an affidavit on April 26, 1879, after the division was, that when he sold out he agreed to sign all necessary papers, 4123-4124; had never been on the route and did not know the number of men and animals necessary, but relied upon another man, 4124; cannot say whether the affidavit was in blank when he swore to it, 4125-4126.

Dorsey, Stephen W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route. Does not recollect the order of May 1, 1879, by which this route was run up from $1,700 originally, to $12,006.25, but recollects that there was an increase, 3939.

France D. Walker, clerk post-office Rawlins, testimony of, 2058-2069. Before expedition the mail arrived at Rawlins at 6 p. m., after the time was reduced to 45 hours it arrived at 6 a. m., 2059. Mail left for the east at 4 a. m. and for the west at 12 o'clock midnight, 2059. Postmasters fixed the schedule, 2066. In May, June and July, 1879, from 15 to 20 letters a day were sent from Rawlins over this route, 2065; mail left Rawlins on 108-hour schedule for White River at 6 a. m., after expedition it left at 9 a. m., 2067; identifies letter (38 S and 39 S), 2068; and (40 S), 2069.

James, Thomas L., ex-Postmaster-General, testimony of, relating to this route, 2035–2042. In the second week in March witness discovered there had been an increase on the Rawlins to White River route, and sent for Brady, who was out; French, the chief clerk, came in, 2035. The next day Brady came in, and, referring to the conversation witness had had with French in regard to increase on this route, said, "Then economy is to be the policy of your administration?" Witness answered "Yes," 2035, 2037. Witness told French to revoke the order of March 8, 1881, for increase, 2037–2038; Brady left the office in April, and it was some time in September that witness discovered the order had not been revoked, 2038; witness did not tell General Brady to revoke the order because he supposed it had been done, 2040; witness signed journal showing the order had been issued on that day, 2042; considered the journal only a record of the order, 2042.

Miner, John R., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route. They gave Rerdell this route and did not consider it in the division with Dorsey, 4179, 4214–4215. Referring to testimony of Rerdell (2226), witness, or Vaile, with his knowledge, did not direct Rerdell to make any representations as to increase or expedition, or with regard to getting up petitions, 4180, and (on 2227) witness made the subcontract with Rerdell for the entire route, 4181; and (on 2526) some arrangements may have been made in regard to giving Rerdell $2,000 on this route, 4181; and (on 2228) it is possible Rerdell may have applied to witness for form of affidavit, but did not instruct Rerdell to send an affidavit to Perkins, 4182. Vaile never made any such statement in witness' presence in regard to Brady's taking the oath of the subcontractor, 4182.

14 S. Letter of J. W. Dorsey and M. C. Rerdell (1956). Witness signed J. W. Dorsey's name, and had a power of attorney to do so. Rerdell did not have any interest of record after February 6, 1879, 4214.

Olcott, John H., clerk contract office, testimony of, for the defense, 2829. The papers called for not in his possession, 2829.

Perkins, Charles F., subcontractor, testimony of, 1990, 2005, 2071–2072; made subcontract (12 S) with M. C. Rerdell in person, as agent for Dorsey, 2001; about January 17, 1879, 1990; identifies letter (36 S) and paper (24 S) as received from Rerdell in the same envelope, 1990, 1991; oath was sworn to in blank as to men and animals and returned to Rerdell; had a conversation with Rerdell at the time he made the contract, witness did not want to take the contract at the price they were getting from the government, and Rerdell agreed to pay him $2,500 for three trips, 1992; Rerdell said they would get up petitions for three trips; Rerdell wrote out petition (26 S) and witness circulated it; witness wanted three trips because he was an interested party, 1993, 1996; one trip, 108-hour schedule, used 2 men and 6 horses in summer, and from 8 to 10 horses in winter, 1993–1994; three trips, 84-hour schedule, 8 men and 20 horses, 1994; three trips, 45-hour schedule, 10 men and from 20 to 30 horses; seven trips, 45-hour schedule, from 22 to 23 men and from 50 to 60 horses, 1994; carried the mail under a temporary contract, 1990, 1993, 1995; men and animals, 1998–2005; identifies letter (37 S), 1998; order for reduction of time was issued May 12, 1879, there was nothing but an Indian Agency at White Pine at that time, 2001; Ute outbreak was last of September, 1879, 2004; there were twenty-two or twenty-three companies at the time of the Ute war, 2001; military mail, 2001, 2002; mail was increased to seven trips, in April, 1881, the troops had all left there except seven or eight companies, 2004; mails are twice as heavy now as when he carried three trips, 2005; identifies letter (41 S), 2071.

Rankin, James G., sheriff, testimony of, 2008, 2009, 2042, 2043, 2054–2058; Rerdell told witness that he wanted to get a letter from the county officers, the governor, and the Delegate for increase of service, 2009, 2054; identifies his signature to (29 S, 1962, 1963), 2054, 2055; Rerdell said that through the influence of Senator Dorsey and Brady that the service would be put on at once, 2054; mail did not run for about two weeks at the time of the Ute outbreak, 2055; witness wanted three trips, but did not know anything about expedition, 2056; before the soldiers came a daily mail would average about 20 letters, 2055; saw John Dorsey at Rawlins about July 1; went to Omaha with him, 2057; Dorsey said he expected to have extra service, and through the influence of his brother could get it done pretty soon, 2057; signed one petition, 2058.

Witnesses—Continued.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 2225–2231, 2274, 2349–2351, 2526–2531, 2568; Vaile told witness they would give him a part of the increases on this route, 2225; witness went to Rawlins January 4, 1879, at the instance of Miner and Vaile, for the purpose of putting on service, 2226; hired a man and horses from Rankin, 2226; sent for Perkins and made a contract with him, 2226; at that time witness had a subcontract on file in his own name, 2227; told Perkins service would be increased right away; Vaile and Miner both told witness it would be, and to make subcontracts with that in view, 2227; met Rankin and Adams at Rawlins, and does not doubt he met Smith, 2227; wrote out three or four petitions for three trips and expedition to 84 hours; put one in the post-office, gave one to a man named Friend, and one to Perkins, 2226; returned to Washington about February 3 or 4, 2227; had a conversation with Vaile March 7, 1879, as to how they could get an affidavit in lieu of John W. Dorsey's; S. W. Dorsey was out with Miner and Vaile at that time, and had directed John W. not to make any more affidavits or furnish any papers to Miner and Vaile, 2229; Vaile said, "I think I can get General Brady to accept one from the subcontractor"; a day or two afterwards Vaile said General Brady had agreed to accept one from the subcontractor; Vaile then instructed witness to write Perkins to send his affidavit, the form being furnished witness at the time; thinks Miner wrote it; kept the form, 2229–2230, 2526; affidavit came back in blank, 2230; turned it over to Vaile and Miner when it was returned, 2527; afterwards found it in the office of S. W. Dorsey, 2527; witness filled in the number of men and animals, and filed it under the direction of S. W. Dorsey, who suggested the numbers to be written in, 2230–2231, 2528–2529; Vaile and Miner agreed to give witness $2,000 per annum after this route should have been increased and expedited; it was after this agreement he sent Perkins the blank affidavit, 2526; John W. Dorsey left Washington in March; Peck was not here, 2231; witness wrote a letter to Eugene Taylor in 1881, 2273; requested him to send in petitions by March 1 in conformity with instructions received from Bosler; struck out, 2274.

Witnesses:

Boone, A. E., mail contractor, testimony of, relating to this route, 2687.

Handwriting:

3 C. Letter of John W. Dorsey (866), signature and all written by Rerdell, 2687.

4 C. Oath of John W. Dorsey (867), body written by W. F. Kellogg, except the figures "38134," and the words "three," "twelve," "ten," "seven," and "thirty eight," and "subcontractor," written by M. C. Rerdell; signature of Dorsey genuine; does not know signature of notary public, 2687.

5 C. Second oath of John W. Dorsey (867), written by Rerdell, except the signature of Dorsey, which is genuine, figures "21," the word "April," and signature of the clerk, 2687.

14 C. Letter of Miner, Peck & Co. (886), written by Miner, 2687.

53 C. Receipt for warrant (940), signature of Vail genuine, 2687.

Bowen, Thomas M., U. S. Senator, Colorado, testimony of, for the defense; development of Colorado since 1878, 3125-3126. Wrote letter (59 C), 3126-3127.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; July 8, 1879, witness made the order (2 C, 866) to increase to 6 trips and allow $2,328 and expedite to 10 hours, and allow $5,432; does not recollect that the letter of the postmaster at Greenwood (8 C, 869), suggesting discontinuance of the route was brought to his attention; identifies indorsement "Do this, Brady," on jacket (7 C, 868), reciting the language of letter (8 C, 869), made up for the discontinuance of the route, 3586; of the two affidavits sworn to by John W. Dorsey on April 21, 1879 (4 C and 5 C, 866-867), one filed on May 6 and the other on May 8, 1879, witness cannot say without the papers which one was used in making the order for expedition, 3432; does not remember that one states that two men and six animals and the other that three men and twelve animals were then in use; that was a small thing; thinks that the proportion comes out just the same whichever one is taken, 3432; identifies oath of J. W. Dorsey (5 C, 867), route 38134, 3543; presumes that he did not take the affidavit of any person not a contractor or subcontractor as the basis of expedition, 3432; does not remember that he took any means to ascertain whether J. W. Dorsey was subcontractor on this route, 3433.

Dorsey, John W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; 4 C and 5 C, oaths of J. W. Dorsey (866-867), witness made both affidavits; knows he did not know anything about the number of men and animals necessary; witness was a subcontractor on that route, but his subcontract was not filed, 4133-4135; does not know that he never signed any subcontract on this route, 4135; or that S. W. Dorsey was subcontractor from April 1, 1879, 4136; recollects that one affidavit came in the early morning mail at 3 o'clock; witness acknowledged it and mailed it; in the afternoon another one came saying there was an error in the first, and witness acknowledged that and mailed it, 4138-4139; both letters indorsing the affidavits were from Rerdell, 4139-4140.

Dorsey, Stephen W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, being asked to state the facts in regard to this route, witness said, "if I had a map showing the location of Pueblo," when the court suggested that he could not see the map, 3799; Pueblo is at the junction of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé, and Denver and Rio Grande Railroads, and is the chief commercial town in Colorado, outside of Denver, 3799; Pueblo, Canyon City, and Rosita made something of a triangle; all trains arrived at Pueblo from the north, south, and east, at half-past one p. m., the stages left for Rosita at three p. m. and arrived there the next morning, 3799; in 1879 that country was prosperous, Rosita was growing rapidly, Silver Cliff was a town of 4,000 or 5,000 people, and the whole mountains were alive with miners, 3805. Referring to affidavit of J. W. Dorsey (4 C, 866, 867), sworn to April 21, 1879, J. W. Dorsey had no interest in this route at that time, 3943; witness has no recollection of filling up the affidavit, 3943-3944; there was a subcontract in J. W. Dorsey's name, but it was not filed, 3944; perhaps witness had a subcontract himself; thinks Miner was contractor, 3944; it was a great surprise to witness, when these proceedings began, to find an affidavit signed by J. W. Dorsey; thinks Rerdell told him he was subcontractor, 3944; does not remember the order of July 8, 1879, for increase and expedition running up to about $7,000; knows that it was increased some time during the summer to about $8,000 for seven times a week service, 3939.

Gooch, James A., postmaster, Rosita, testimony of, 894-902; in 1878 and 1879 the principal mail from Pueblo came by Canyon City over route 38132, 895; from Rosita to Silver Cliff it was 8 miles, Rosita to Canyon City was 30 miles 895; Silver Cliff got its mail from Canyon City. Mail leaving Pueblo in the morning, arrived at Rosita on this route, from 6 to 8 p. m.; mail leaving Pueblo at 2 p. m. arrived at Rosita by the Canyon City route at from 3 to 4 p. m. the next day, 895; growth of Silver Cliff and Rosita, 896-900; mail received at Rosita over this route would weigh from 3 to 5 pounds, in which there were from 3 to 5 letters, 902; arrival and departure of the mail, 901.

Hull, Alvah A., subcontractor, testimony of, 871-881; carried the mail for Eli Hanson from February, 1880, to July 31, 1881, 7 trips a week on 10-hour schedule, distance 50 miles, 872; used 6-horse coaches and carried passengers and express, 872; to carry the mail alone 7 times a week and 10-hour schedule would take 5 men and 12 horses, 873, 879; 1 time a week, 15-hour schedule, would take 2 men, 4 horses, 873, 875; witness carried the mail on horseback 7 times a week about 6 weeks, 874; Greenwood was the only intermediate office except Silver Park, which was discontinued; witness received $2,600 per annum, 873, 879; men and animals, 875, 879; roads, 879-881; did not file his subcontract, 881.

Laird, Charles H., clerk finance office, testimony of, 902; produces receipts for warrants, 902.

Mark, Cyrus, assistant postmaster, Pueblo, testimony of, 924-933; in 1878, letters for Rosita were sent by the Canyon City route; after route 38134 was 7 times a week letters for Rosita mailed before 1 p. m. were sent by Canyon City; those mailed after 1 p. m. were sent by route 38134 next morning; when this route was once a week mailed about 25 letters; when it was 7 times a week mailed from 1 to 10, 928; mail sent to Rosita sent by route 38134 averaged 2 or 3 letters; sometimes only a mail-bill was sent; most of the Rosita mail was sent by the other route, 928; Pueblo was supplied by 5 other routes, 929; population of Pueblo, 929; quantity of mail, 930-933; did not report to General Brady number of letters going over this route, 930; witness made up the schedule time, 933-934; mail from Rosita over route 38134 arrived about 6 or 7 p. m., 933.

Miner, John R., one of the defendants; testimony of, relating to this route; 25 C, 28 C, 31 C, 37 C, 40 C, 43 C, 51 C, contractors' drafts, were signed by witness prior to May 5, 1879, and the dates filled in afterwards, 4211.

34 C and 46 C, contractors' drafts, the dates of which were blank, were signed by witness prior to May 5, 1879, 5211. Does not know whether he testified before the Congressional committee to the extracts read to him, 4242.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 2232; went west on April 17 or 18, 1879, 2232; made a subcontract, 2232.

Handwriting:

3 C. Letter of John W. Dorsey (866), signature and all written by witness, who had authority to sign, 2333.

4 C. Oath of John W. Dorsey (866), body written by W. F. Kellogg, the number of the route and of men and animals by witness; signature of Dorsey genuine, 2333, 2334.

5 C. Second oath of John W. Dorsey (867), all except the signatures of Dorsey and Wainwright and the date sworn to was written by witness; signature of Dorsey genuine, 2334.

14 C and 15 C. Letters of Miner, Peck & Co. (885, 886), signatures and all were written by Miner, 2334.

53 C. Receipt for warrant (940), signature of Vaile genuine, 2334.

On the question of the admission of a letter of William Ingersoll, P. M. Pueblo, dated December 15, 1877, advising the department of an error in the length of the route as advertised, of Mr. Ker, 762, 763; Mr. Henkle, 763, 764; Mr. Ingersoll, 763, 767; Mr. Merrick, 765-767.

Contract of John R. Miner with the United States, dated March 15, 1878, $548 per annum, sureties, D. W. C. Wheeler and S. N. Hoyt, witnessed by J. W. Dorsey and A. A. Freidrich, 549, 758.

Decisions of the court:

That in an indictment to commit a fraud against the United States it is not necessary to specify the particulars, as all frauds against the United States are criminal, 777.

That proof of overt acts will not be admitted behind the period of limitations, but acts, although in one view overt acts, may be admitted to prove a combination, 775.

An overt act may have been committed after a paper was filed, 781.

That it is necessary for one or more overt acts to be proved, 777.

Belford, James B., M. C., Colorado, testimony of, for the defense, 2782.

Identifies his signature to petition (7 B, 783), 2782.

Boone, Albert E., mail-contractor, testimony of, 2686.

Handwriting:

5 B. Oath of Miner (778), all but the signature of W. F. Kellogg was written by Miner, 2686.

6 B. Letter of Miner (779), signature and all written by Rerdell, 2686.

8 B. Letter of Chaffee (784), does not know the handwriting, 2686.

18 B. Subcontract of S. W. Dorsey (789), all written by Miner, except the signatures of Rerdell and Dorsey, which are genuine, 2686.

33 B. Subcontract of Ames (806), both signatures and all by Miner, 2686.

35 B. Letter of Ames (824), signature and all by Miner, 2686.

"Proposal" partly by Miner and partly by Boone, amount filled in by Rerdell; signatures of the bondsmen genuine, 2686.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route. Does not remember why he added one trip and reduced the time, and paid $2,301.60 more than it would have cost for 6 trips, original schedule, unless it was for the reason stated upon the jacket (4 B, 778), or how they arrived at a 7 hours' schedule if they asked for 8; witness may have concluded that he preferred 7, which would make it a little more than 4 miles an hour, 3412; or that his attention was called to the fact that the route should have been advertised as from Pueblo, 3413; believes there was no post-office at Saint Charles, and it was necessary to extend the route to Pueblo, 3413. Where a mistake of that kind occurs, if they are railroad points, the error could be corrected by shifting the terminus to some other railroad point, 3413; or they could have readvertised the route, or discontinued it, and made a temporary contract for 6 months, 3414; does not remember what action he took upon letter of William Ingersoll (2 B, 772); could not compel the contractor to carry the mail from Pueblo to Greenhorn, under a contract from Saint Charles, 3414. Order (1 B, 771) to change the terminus to Pueblo and allow $328.80 was a proper one under the law, 3414, 3415; does not remember to have seen the statement of the special agent of the department that it ought not to have been done, 3457. Although the distance traveled was no further than the advertised distance, it having been advertised from point to point, contractor was entitled to the addition, 3415, 3457; does not know that department was notified of a temporary contract to carry the mail from Saint Charles to Pueblo, and was allowed for the extended distance. 3415; made the order (20 B, 789) to embrace Agate and the order (23 B, 790, 791) to omit Agate with one month's extra pay, 3553, 3554. The jacket shows why he was allowed one month's extra pay, when the files of the department show there had never been a day's service in carrying the mail to Agate; the fact that the distance was 8 miles, while they ordered the contractor to do it at 3 miles, would justify his non-performance of the service, 3554.

Dorsey, Stephen W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; the testimony of Rerdell (2272) that he wrote the words "and fast time" in petition (7 B, 783), by direction of witness, is false; did not direct Rerdell to write the words "on quicker time" in petition (12 B, 786), 3787; or direct him to write the words "on faster schedule" in petition (11 B, 785), it is absurd to suppose he did, 3787; referring to order of June 26, running this route up from $548 to $3,069, remembers there was an increase made, but cannot give the date; thinks the amount stated is about right, 3939-3940.

Farish, William B., subcontractor, testimony of, 834-836; carried the mail about 3 months, commencing August 20, 1881, made the trip Pueblo to Greenhorn in from 6 to 10 hours, ordinarily in 8 hours; 3 trips; used 2 horses, and drove himself, 835; received $840 per annum, 835; mail to Greenhorn averaged from 10 to 40 pounds; the other way, from 2 to 8 pounds, 835; roads, 836.

Higgason, William H., subcontractor, testimony of, 839-840; carried the mail 3 trips on 7-hour schedule, 839; drove himself and used 2 horses; was paid $840, 839; has made the trip in 5 hours, 840.

McDaniel, J. H., subcontractor, testimony of, 837-839; received $840 for carrying the mail 3 trips, 7-hour schedule, 837; used 1 man and 2 horses, 837; did not file his subcontract, 838; could not supply Agate for the compensation, 838; received no pay for Agate, 838-839; it was 3 miles off the route, 839.

Mark, Cyrus, assistant postmaster Pueblo, testimony of, 847-849; mail left Pueblo for the East at 1 p. m. and arrived at 2 p. m., mail on the Greenhorn route arrived from 2 to 7 p. m.; after expedition it seldom arrived in time to make connection, 848-849; before expedition mail on this route arrived from 1 to 7 p. m., 849; made monthly reports to department, which were correct, 849.

Miner, John R., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route.

5 B. Oath of Miner (778); all in witness' handwriting, except the signature of notary; has the appearance of not all having been written at the same time, 4236; made the affidavit at request of Rerdell; had no interest in the route at the time; the partition was not completed at that time, 4184, 4237, 4242-4243; believes the estimate of men and animals was fair and just, 4187.

6 B and 9 B. Letters of Miner (779, 784-785) were not signed by witness, 4209.

33 B. Subcontract of Ames (806).

35 B. Letter of Ames (824); signature and all are in witness' handwriting; Ames was his nephew, and witness was authorized to sign his name, 4187.

49 B and 62 B, contractors' drafts were signed by witness prior to May 5, 1879, and the dates put in afterwards, 4211.

55 B, 61 B, and 64 B, contractors' drafts, the dates in which are now blank, were signed by witness prior to May 5, 1879, 4211.

Piper, Jahzeel S., postmaster Agate, testimony of, 841-847; was postmaster 13 months; Agate was about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles off the route, and, by the traveled road, would add about 3 miles to the distance, 841; no mail was ever delivered there; identifies quarterly accounts, 842; received no pay as postmaster, 842; carrier came there once, 845; reported delinquency December 31, 1881, 846; good road to Agate, 847; distances, 844-847.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 2332, 2333, 2543-2545, 2572-2573; went West again April 17 or 18, 1879, 2232; made a subcontract on route 38135, 2233.

Handwriting:

"Proposal 1" partly written by Miner and partly written by Boone; amount filled in by Rerdell, 2332.

5 B. Oath of Miner (778) was all written by Miner except signature of W. F. Kellogg, 2332, 2572.

6 B. Letter of Miner (779), signature and all by witness. Mr. Dorsey directed witness to see Miner and get an affidavit, and the letter was written in anticipation of procuring the affidavit, 2572.

7. B. Petition (783), words "and faster time" written by Rerdell, by instruction of S. W. Dorsey, 2272, 2333; received the petition about May 5 or 6, 1879,

Witnesses:

Bergner William C., subcontractor, testimony of, 1050-1056; carried the mail for De Busk 3 trips, schedule of 12 hours, drove himself, used 3 horses, and had 3 extra horses, 1050; when he carried it for himself used 4 horses, 1052; men and animals 1052-1054; received checks for his pay from Rerdell signed by Miner, 1054; identifies letters received from Miner, 1054; when he quit carrying the mail, there was one quarter's pay due, Rerdell paid him last February, 1056.

Boone, A. E., mail contractor, testimony of, relating to this route, 2691-2692.

Handwriting:

5 E. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1029); signature and all written by S. W. Dorsey, 2691.

6 E. Oath of J. W. Dorsey (1029); body was written by Kellogg; cannot say as to the signature of J. W. Dorsey; filled in by S. W. Dorsey, except the word "twelve," which resembles Rerdell's handwriting, 2692.

17 E. Letter of Miner and S. W. Dorsey (1035); written by Rerdell except the signature of Dorsey, which is genuine, 2692.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route.

to have said "distance to be hereafter stated," 3416; order (10 E, 1031) to allow $173 for embracing Raton was made by French, and very properly, 3416; the reason he made the route 3 trips and expedited it from 19 to 12 hours, paying $2,222 more than it would have cost to have made it 6 trips, original schedule, was to make it a fast instead of a frequent service, and Belford and Chaffee both asked that it be made fast, 3417; being shown order for expedition (4 E, 1028-1029), and papers 5, 7, 8, and 9 E, and 66 to 70 E, defense, states that none of them ask for any specific time, but that Belford and Chaffee both recommended that the trip be made in one day, 3553; the route having been 19 hours, he presumed they meant about 12 hours; the fact that the affidavit of the contractor sworn to April 26, preceding, specifies 12 hours does not aid his recollection as to how he arrived at a 12-hour schedule, 3553; probably it did not suggest itself to him that he could have transferred Raton to the route that the postmaster and Senator Teller asked, and leave this route as a 13-hour route without expedition, and save $4,200. Raton having been added, and expedition asked for afterwards, the fact that it added 23 miles would not militate against reducing the time, 3418; does not remember whether he considered the fact that the revenues of all the offices on the route other than Trinidad were but $168 per annum, as they were not stated on the jacket, 3418; presumes that affidavit of John W. Dorsey (6 E, 1029) was the one upon which he acted in making the order for expedition, 3432, 3433; he accepted the statement made on the jacket by Turner that J. W. Dorsey was subcontractor, 3433.

De Busk, S. W., postmaster at Raton and sub-subcontractor, testimony of, 1027, 1028, 1035-1050, 1061-1068; as to sketch map, 1027, 1028, 1048; name of Raton was changed to Alfalfa, and that of San José to Grinnell, 1035; was postmaster about a year, his appointment was dated from January, 1878, salary was about $12 per annum, based upon stamps sold, no service at Raton while he was postmaster, 1035; Pulaski was the nearest post-office to Raton that had a mail service, it was 12 miles distant, 1041, and was supplied by a railroad in the fall of 1878, 1048; the subcontractor used 1 man and 2 horses for 1 trip a week, 1036; witness carried the mail from October, 1879, until October, 1880, 3 trips, 12-hour schedule, and used 1 man in summer and 2 men in winter, and had 3 horses for daily use, and 3 more for changes, 1036, 1039; received his remittances from M. C. Rerdell, statements of account were signed by Miner, 1037; struck out, 1038; received $1,550 per annum, 1037; struck out, 1038; corrects his testimony, 1039; did not make close connection at Trinidad or Madison, 1039; letter (2 E), 1040-1044; men and animals, 1036, 1039, 1045-1048; location of Barela, 1048; distances, 1049, 1050; Raton was taken off the route in August, 1881, 1062; letters of Rerdell (59 E and 60 E), 1062-1066; received one check signed by S. W. Dorsey and another by J. W. Bosler, 1067.

Dorsey, John W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route.

6 E. Oath of J. W. Dorsey (1029); witness signed the affidavit; did not have any interest in the route at that time; does not know whether he was subcontractor; he believed the affidavit was true; accepted Rerdell's statement, 4142; presumed Rerdell asked him to swear to it, 4142, but will not say so, 4143; does not remember that J. W. Dorsey asked him to swear to it, 4143; does not think he sent affidavits to Rerdell in blank, 4142.

Dorsey, Stephen W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route.

Referring to order May 9, 1879, increasing the route from $388 to $2,758, remembers that it was increased, 3940; this route ran along the north side of Raton Mountains, it was a farming and stock-grazing country; no mines there in 1878, 1879, or 1880; the increase of stock men, large purchases and investments were very great, the want of communication was so great that they built their own telegraph and telephone lines; witness had one at his place, and his neighbors had one which followed the wagon track along the route; Trinidad was the center of business, 3806.

Miner, John R., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route.

17 E. Letter of Miner (1035); witness did not sign that letter, 4209.

63 E. Defense, letter of Miner (3251); witness did not write that letter, 4207.

31 E, 34 E, 37 E, 42 E, 49 E, and 55 E, contractors' drafts, were signed by witness prior to May 5, 1879, and the dates inserted afterwards 4210-4211.

40 E, 43 E, and 46 E, contractors' drafts, the dates in which are now blank, were signed by witness prior to May 5, 1879, 4210-4211.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 2336.

55 F. Petition (1138) taken in connection with the two preceding papers, would say it was written by S. W. Dorsey, 2694–2695.

65 F. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1198); signature of J. W. Dorsey was written by M. C. Rerdell, 2695.

Bowen, Thomas M., United States Senator, Colorado, testimony of, for the defense, 3125; has lived in Colorado eight years, was judge of the fourth judicial district in 1879, 3125; wrote letter (29 F, 1092); the facts stated were true, 3125.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route. Does not remember, independently of the papers, who interested himself in procuring the order for increase and expedition on this route, 3419; or why he did not prefer to make it a 6-trip route instead of expediting from 90 to 50 hours, and thus save the Government $4,626 a year, except that it was much better to have a fast 3 times a week service than a slow 6 times a week service, 3419; the statement of postmasters in reply to circulars requesting them to fix the schedule within 50 hours, that it was impossible, is ridiculous on the face of it, nothing was impossible in that direction, they could have carried the mail in 50 hours if they had had men and horses enough, 3119; does not know that he ever saw schedule (9 F 1058), indorsed by terminal postmasters that schedule time was immaterial and it was impracticable and almost impossible to carry the mail in 50 hours, 3420; if at the time witness made the order (18 F. 1084) to increase 2 trips, allow $3,316.80, and to expedite to 50 hours and allow $8,457.84, there were two affidavits on file, (20 F and 22 F, 1085–1087), one for 80 hours and the other for 50 hours, presumes he made the order on the one for 50 hours, does not know that he had any information as to the number of men and horses other than contained in those affidavits, 3586; or that his attention was called to the fact that there were two affidavits, 3587; if one states that for 3 trips on the then schedule it took 5 men and 15 animals, and the other 3 men and 7 animals, he seems to have accepted one of them as conclusive, 3587.

Calleghan, John T., inspection clerk, contract office, testimony of, 1192–1197; identifies files of the inspection division, 1192; course of business as to fines and deductions, 1192–1197.

Dorsey, John W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 20 F and 22 F, oaths of John W. Dorsey, (1085–1087); witness signed both affidavits, one was for a 50-hour and the other for an 80-hour schedule; they both make the same propositions; witness had no pecuniary interest in this on March 11, 1879; the trade had then been virtually made; Vaile and Miner had charge of the route at that time, 4141.

Dorsey, Stephen W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route: In 1879 the revival had just begun, Animas City probably had 300 or 400 people, Durango had begun to grow and has now 3,000 or 4,000 people, 3806; at the mining camp of Rico, west of there, were 3,000 or 4,000 people in 1879; soon after Fort Lewis was established and the troops moved there in 1879, 3806–3807; letter (10 F, 1079) of witness to Brady, June 10, 1878, refers to the route from Garland to Conejos to Ojo Caliente; in consequence of that letter the route from Garland to Ojo Caliente was discontinued, that part from Ojo Caliente to Animas City was left on, the letter resulted in discontinuing at least 100 miles of the Ojo Caliente route, 3807; witness at that time had no interest in the route, 3807; witness made a little diagram to explain the letter at the time Rerdell was being tried in the police court, 3807; thinks that if J. W. Dorsey had no interest in the route and made an affidavit for expedition on April 26, 1879, it was because the Department required the contractor to make the affidavit; does not know that it was in execution of the agreement made the division that each side should render the necessary service to the other for the purpose of expediting and increasing the routes, 3937; has no recollection of having written the number of the route, the words "three trips," "five," "fifteen," "fifty," "three," "twelve," and "forty-two," in oath of John W. Dorsey (22 F, 1087) 3771-3772, 3937; the order of April 29, allowing $11,774 on that affidavit, or the testimony of Boone (2693) that witness had filled up the affidavit, does not refresh his recollection; one other party can write a very similar hand to his, 3938; will not say he did not fill it up, 3939; does not know where J. W. Dorsey was April 26, 1879, or whether he had gone to California, 3939; does not think he ever had any conversation with Rerdell, 2240; directing him to send out blank affidavits to Dorsey and Peck, 3772.

Route 38150.—There was a great mining boom in 1879 between Silverton and Animas City, 3808; in relation to order June 12, 1879, increasing the pay from $1,288 to $14,808, there was an increase made, but witness was not here at that time, and does not remember, 3940.

Jaramillo, Pedro J., subcontractor, testimony of, 1163-1177, 1253-1254; identifies his subcontract (57 F) and letter (58 F), 1164, and release of subcontract (60 F), 1168, and letter of Miller (67 F), 1177; carried the mail for 10 months; commenced Sept. 1, 1879, 1165; carried the mail 3 trips, and from 60 to 70 hours, afterwards in 50 hours; used 6 carriers and 16 horses, and had 10 horses in his stable, 1166; mail would weigh from 150 to 200 pounds, once it weighed 600 pounds, 1166; from December to March it was impossible to make the trip in 50 hours, 1166-1167; was fined but never received any remissions, 1173; distances, 1173-1174; men and animals, 1174-1175; time made, 1175; fines and remissions, 1175-1176; had a contract with J. L. Sanderson without any schedule, 1176; always carried the mail by Pagosa Springs, 1253; it was a military post, 1253.

Joseph, Anthony, subcontractor, testimony of, 1097-1163, 1254-1255. Identifies letters of S. W. Dorsey (39 F 1102), 1097, (42 F), 1103, (43 F), 1104; and letters of Rerdell (44 F), (45 F), and (46 F), 1105; and his own letters (8 F), 1106; and (48 F defense), 1119, (49 F defense), 1120, (50 F defense), 1120, (51 F defense), 1121, (52 F defense), 1122, and (53 F defense), 1123; and subcontract (47 F), 1109; witness put service on route January 1, 1879, at request of ex-Senator Dorsey, 1097; the request was made by letter; has made diligent search and cannot find the letter, 1098; the letter stated that John H. Watts would discontinue service on January 1, 1879, and that he wished witness to stock route and continue it, and that he would be personally responsible for the cost, and that his brother John W. Dorsey had the contracts and was sick or absent, 1100; received the letter in December, 1878, 1100; corrects his testimony so as to say that the lost letter said to have been from S. W. Dorsey was from John W. Dorsey, 1125; roads, 1107; mountains crossed, 1108-1109; could not travel at night, 1107-1108; made a subcontract the latter part of January, 1879, with Rerdell as agent of J. W. Dorsey, 1109; conversation with S. W. Dorsey in August, 1879, told him it was impossible to carry the mail on 50-hour schedule, Dorsey said "we have not received a dollar for the service you have rendered, as the fines and deductions have consumed the earnings of the service," 1113; S. W. Dorsey paid him at that time $109.39, witness had previously received for first quarter 1879, $383.89, 1113; witness showed Dorsey a check for $109.39 which had not been signed, Dorsey signed it and told witness to get the certificates of service from the postmasters and he would endeavor to get a remission of the fines, 1115; witness procured the certificates but never received the remissions, 1115, 1139; circulated petitions at request of S. W. Dorsey, 1116; made the time in 7 days, one trip a week, used 3 men and 6 horses, 1116-1117; afterwards increased to 6 men and 9 horses, 1157; two trips, used 9 men and 18 horses, 1157; 3 trips used 6 carriers and 27 horses, 1158; in February, 1881, mail from Barancas to Ojo Caliente was carried by a man named Kimball, 1159; men and animals, 1160-1163; J. H. Watts preceded and Pedro J. Jaramillo succeeded witness in carrying the mail, 1118; distances, 1124, 1125; petitions, 1125, 1138, 1139; construction of railroad, 1125, 1126, 1131; identifies map submitted by defense, 1131-1133; mail connections, 1134-1138; after he testified at the last trial S. W. Dorsey paid him $500, in full settlement of his claims, 1140; 25 per cent. of mail matter was letters and papers, the remainder was merchandise, 1152; mail weighed from 200 to 500 pounds, 1153; always carried the mail by Pagosa Springs, 1254; was instructed by contractor to carry it that way, 1255; the road by Park View was 25 or 30 miles shorter, 1254; there were 5 or 6 companies of troops at Pagosa Springs, 1255.

Miner, John R., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route:

47 F. Subcontract of Anthony Joseph (1110-1111); does not know that this is the subcontract Rerdell made, 4246.

Olcott, John H., corresponding clerk, contract office; testimony of, 1192-1197, 1203-1210; produces route register for Colorado and New Mexico from 1878 to 1882, 1203; there was no mail route from Barancas to Ojo Caliente, 1206; no order adding Pagosa Springs to this route prior to April 27, 1879, 1207, 1208; orders in route-book relating to this route, 1209, 1210; testimony of for the defense, 2825; papers called for in subpoena not in his possession, 2825.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants; testimony of, relating to this route, 2227, 2337-2338, 2545, 2546; witness went to Taos and Ojo Caliente, reaching there January 25 or 26, 1879; thinks that he made his subcontract with Joseph, 2227.

Handwriting:

Proposal 7 (553) was partly written by Miner and partly by Boone, the amount filled in by Rerdell; signature of J. W. Dorsey is genuine, 2338.

10 F. Letter of S. W. Dorsey (1079), all written by Rerdell except the words "Denver and," "this," "river," and the signature and the pencil diagram annexed, which were written by S. W. Dorsey, 2337, 2545; witness does not believe that Dorsey made the plat for Ingersoll at the time of the trial before Judge Snell nor that the writing upon the back was written by Ingersoll, 2546.

19 F. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1085), signature and all were written by S. W. Dorsey, 2337.

20 F. Oath of J. W. Dorsey (1085-1086); body was written by Rerdell, signature of John W. Dorsey genuine, the number and description of the route and figures relating to the men and animals and the time were written in by witness, by direction of S. W. Dorsey, after the oath was sworn to, 2337.

21 F. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1086, 1087); signature and all were written by witness, 2337.

22 F. Second oath of J. W. Dorsey (1087); body was written by W. F. Kellogg, except figures "38145," and words "three," "five," "fifteen," "fifty," "three," "twelve," and "forty-two," which were written by S. W. Dorsey, signature of J. W. Dorsey genuine, 2235, 2338; witness did not see him fill it up, 2560.

23 F. Letter of S. W. Dorsey (1087) was written and signed by S. W. Dorsey, 2338.

28 F. Letter of Chaffee (1092), all except the signature was written by John A. Sibbald, 2338.

35 F. Petition (1138), down to and including the word "names," was written by S. W. Dorsey, 2338.

36 F. Petition (1094-1095), body written by witness, 2338.

39 F. Letter of S. W. Dorsey (1102), the words "written" and "route," and the signature and P. S. were written by S. W. Dorsey, 2338. Dorsey was on his way west when this letter was written, 2546.

40 F. and 41 F. Forms of petition (1103) were written by S. W. Dorsey, 2338.

65 F. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1198), body was written by John W. Steele, 2338.

Handwriting:

5 Q. Letter J. W. Dorsey (1855) all written by Rerdell, 2700.

6 Q. Oath of J. W. Dorsey (1855) all written by Rerdell except the word and figures "April 21st"; signature of J. W. Dorsey is genuine, 2700.

25 Q. Subcontract of Steinegar (1861) was partly written by Rerdell and partly by J. W. Dorsey; the words and figures "guarantee," "S. W. Dorsey," "Nov. 24, 1879," were written by S. W. Dorsey, 2700.

32 Q. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1895), "J. W. Dorsey" and "M. C. Rerdell" (M. C. Rerdell is crossed out) were written by Rerdell, 2700.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route: Being shown 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12 Q, being the order and accompanying papers for expedition, has no recollection as to how he arrived at the precise time of 15 hours to which he reduced the schedule, 3552; petitions generally call for faster time and an increased number of trips, but none specify any particular time; as the route was 65 miles long 15 hours was a little more than 4 miles an hour, 3552; the fact that the only paper on file other than the order which specifies 15 hours is the contractor's oath made on April 21; preceding does not aid his memory as to how it happened that the contractor, on April 21, and witness on June 12, hit upon the 15-hour schedule, 3553; does not remember that the route passed 10,000 feet above the level of the sea, but knows it was a very difficult route, 3553; or to have seen petition for extension of schedule from 15 to 24 hours (14 Q, 1858), and letter of Senator Hill transmitting it (13 Q, 1857, 1858), filed in November, 1880; witness went to Indiana and is not certain that he was here at that time, 3461-3462.

Calleghan, John T., inspection clerk, testimony of, 1893-1894; identifies papers relating to deductions and remissions, 1893-1894.

Cornell, Clarence W., mail carrier, testimony of, 1875-1879; carried the mail from July 1, 1879, to October, 1879, 1875; they were making 7 trips on a schedule of 15 hours, 1875-1876; there were 4 drivers on the route; they averaged 3 horses each, sometimes 4; each driver took care of his own stock, 1875; in going from Silverton to Parrott City you pass through Animas City; there is a trail another way, but no one travels it, 1876; mail would not weigh over 40 pounds, 1876; carried the mail on horseback; if there were passengers would take a 2-horse team, 1876; men and animals, 1876-1879.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route:

2 Q. Proposal (554), body written by Miner, amount "1,488" by Rerdell, signature of J. W. Dorsey genuine, 2348-2349.

6 Q. Oath of J. W. Dorsey (1855), body was written by witness, signature of Dorsey genuine, figures were put in by witness after the oath was sworn to, about May 5 or 6, 1879, by direction of S. W. Dorsey, who furnished the figures, 2348, 2559-2560.

8 Q. Letter of James B. Belford (1856), body written by witness, signature of Belford genuine, 2348.

10 Q. Letter of J. B. Chaffee (1856), all except signature written by John A. Sibbald, 2348.

19 Q. Subcontract of William E. Earle (1860), part written by Miner, genuine signature of John W. Dorsey, 2348.

21 Q. Subcontract of S. W. Dorsey (1860), body written by Miner, signatures of J. W. and S. W. Dorsey are genuine, 2348.

23 Q. Letter of J. W. and S. W. Dorsey (1861), signature and all, written by witness, 2348.

25 Q. Subcontract of Fred. Steinegar (1861) partly written by witness and partly by J. W. Dorsey, genuine signature of J. W. and S. W. Dorsey to guarantee on the back, 2348.

31 Q. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1895), signature and all, by witness, 2348.

32 Q. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1895), body written by clerk; signature of J. W. Dorsey was written by witness, 2348.

Letters of—Continued.

- Murray, Eli H., governor, and John A. Hunter, chief justice of Utah, to Brady, October 15, 1880, recommending daily mail, which would complete a daily service from the Central to the Southern roads, and greatly increase the benefits of a daily mail on the routes now established (322 K, defense), 3296-3297.
- Myers, Chas. F., postmaster Pioche, to Second Assistant, July 27, 1878, service not yet commenced (4 K), 1631; July 31, 1878, contractor has failed to appear (5 K), 1632; September 3, 1878, service commenced, August 31, 1878 (6 K), 1632; August 5, 1879, seven-trip service not yet commenced (23 K), 1641; September 18, 1880, in answer to inquiry of department, mail dispatched will average 5 lbs., mainly papers and packages, mail received 4 oz., mainly letters (85 K), 1658; same letter as 85 K, 1658 (154 K, defense), 2943-2944; to Brady, March 2, 1879, tri-weekly service commenced February 22 (104 K, defense), 2930; January 25, 1879, extra service should have started January 16, none yet put on (105 K, defense), 2930; August 20, 1879, seven trips service was commenced August, 1879 (323 K, defense), 3297; October 30, 1880, contractor carried the mail regularly to September 30, 1880 (293 K, defense), 2986; to Jennings, March 15, 1880, is convinced it is impossible for him to carry the mail within 60 hours; has received no instructions from the department as to any prescribed schedule (189 K, defense), 2956.
- Peck, John M., M., to Brady, November 27, 1878, requesting permission to sublet (9 K), 1633.
- Randall, Alder, postmaster Mineral Park, to Brady, July 15, 1878 (?), contractor failed to put on service, contract price much below what the actual cost of carrying the mail should be, time has been shortened and cost increased without any corresponding benefit (withdrawn), 1632; August 28, 1878, service commenced to-day (7 K), 1633.
- Rerdell, M. C., to Sixth Auditor, August 21, 1880, deductions in first quarter 1879, should be charged to Vaile; will you permit Vaile to take advantage of his own wrong and thus defraud another man out of his money (102 K), 1661, 1662; to Brady, May 7, 1879, inclosing his subcontract (33 K), 1649; and John W. Dorsey, R., to Brady, May 15, 1879, requesting withdrawal of subcontract (36 K), 1650.

- Stevens, H. S., Delegate, to Brady, October 21, 1878, recommending increase to 3 trips, filed December 20, 1878 (14 K), 1635; no date, recommending expedition to 60 hours, filed December 20, 1878 (15 K), 1635-1636.
- Vaile, H. M., and John W. Dorsey, M., to Brady, May 5, 1879, requesting withdrawal of subcontract (31 K), 1648.
- Vaile, H. M., to J. M. McGrew, July 9, 1880 (read from the record of the last trial) relative to the Jennings's case; although he was subcontractor of record, it was as trustee for J. W. and S. W. Dorsey, Jennings and others; all the money collected not paid to Jennings was paid to liquidate the debts of J. W. and S. W. Dorsey and others; believes that Jennings and both J. W. and S. W. Dorsey are irresponsible, and it would be impossible for the writer to receive back the $2,800, 4065.
- Mail bills, 39, covering the period from November 16, 1879, to December 24, 1879, showing the amount of mail dispatched at Mineral Park and received at Pioche (45 K. to 83 K, inclusive), 1653-1657.
- Mail bills showing departure of each mail from—
 Mineral Park and arrival at Pioche in third quarter 1879 (114 to 152 K, defense), 2935-2943; the mail bills have already been put in evidence by the prosecution, first quarter 1880 (156 to 163 K, defense), 2944-2946; (169 to 185 K, defense), 2943-2953; second quarter 1880 (194 to 263 K, defense), 2960-2976; third quarter 1880 (270 to 291 K, defense), 2980-2985; (294 to 296 and 298 to 301 K, defense), 2986-2988; fourth quarter 1880 (303 to 317 K, defense), 2988-2991.

Payments, tabulated statement showing, to H. M. Vaile, S. W. Dorsey, M. C. Rerdell, I. Jennings, assignees; M. Salisbury and M. C. Rerdell, subcontractors, 733.

Petitions for increase to 3 trips and schedule to 60 hours instead of 84 hours, filed December 20, 1878 (17 K), 1636; on route 40105, signatures to which are identical with petition on route 40104, names printed in full (18 K), 1638, 1639.

Proposal of John W. Dorsey sworn to January 9, 1878, before A. E. Boone; sureties, J. O. Evans and L. S. Filbert; witnessed by A. E. Boone and John R. Miner (1 K), 553, 1629.

Receipt of H. M. Vaile, subcontractor, January 31, 1879, to J. W. Dorsey, contractor, for $4,870.08 in full for service for first quarter, 1879, 4066.

Remissions, statement of, 733.

Reports of the Auditor, dated April 14, 1880, certifying balance payable to Jennings for one month's extra pay (96 K), 1660; August 31, 1880, for amount of deductions in first quarter, 1879, erroneously charged to M. C. Rerdell (99 K), 1660; first quarter 1879 (325 K.), 4066-4067.

Revenue, certified transcript of, 2756-2757.

Subcontracts of—

Jennings, Isaac, dated July 1, 1879, 3 trips $12,600, 6 trips $25,200, 7 trips $28,000, signed John W. Dorsey, indorsed, "Filed with me March 17, 1881, Thos. J. Brady," also, "Turner, file this subcontract, to take effect July 1, 1879, and instruct Auditor to readjust payment accordingly, Brady" (86 K), 1658.

McKibbin, J. C., dated June 29, 1880, full pay, signed John W. Dorsey, by M. C. Rerdell, attorney (39 K), 1651.

Rerdell, M. C., dated April 1, 1878, full pay, signed John W. Dorsey, by M. C. Rerdell (M. C. Rerdell erased and signed again as subcontractor) (overt act 34 K), 1652.

Salisbury, Monroe, dated April 20, 1880, signed J. W. Dorsey, by M. C. Rerdell (43 K), 1652.

Warrants (not read), 1659-1669.

Witnesses:

Boone, A. E., mail contractor, testimony of, relating to this route, 2697-2698, 2710.

1 K. Proposal of J. W. Dorsey (553, 1629) was filled up by Miner except the words "twenty-nine hundred and eighty-two"; J. W. Dorsey took the oath in blank before witness, and the date of the oath was filled in afterwards, 2697-2698.

9 K. Letter of Peck, M. (1633), signature and all written by Miner, 2697.

12 K. Oath of J. W. Dorsey (1634), all except the signatures written by Miner; J. W. Dorsey did not write his signature, 2697, 2710.

13 K. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1634), written by J. R. Miner; J. W. Dorsey did not write his signature, 2697, 2710.

17 K. Petition (1636), the words "three trips on a schedule of 60 hours instead of 84 hours," and the word "Pioche," were written by Rerdell, 2697.

18 K. Petition (1638-1639), the words "Ehrenberg," "forty," "eight," and "sixty" were written by Miner, 2697.

20 K. Letter of J. W. Dorsey, signature and all written by Rerdell, 2697.

36 K. Letter of Rerdell and J. W. Dorsey, R. (1650), written by Rerdell, 2697.

37 K. Letter of J. W. Dorsey and Rerdell (1650) was written by Rerdell, 2697.

41 K. Letter of J. C. McKibbin and J. W. Dorsey (1651), all written by Rerdell except the signature of McKibbin, which is genuine, 2697.

86 K. Subcontract of Jennings (1658), the first page is all in the handwriting of Rerdell, except the words "W. H. Henderson," "J. M. Craig," "W. C. Woodman," and "G. R. Alexander"; the signature of J. W. Dorsey is by Rerdell, 2697.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route: they were anxious to get up a continuous daily mail service from the southernmost point of the Utah Southern Railroad on through to the Southern Pacific; if the service had been properly performed it would have made a much shorter connection for the mail from San Francisco and the East, 3399; the service was not properly performed and was cut down to once a week; it was represented that a great injustice was done to the contractor and they were induced to put it back to three times a week instead of seven; constant and persistent efforts were made to restore it to seven times a week again, but witness refused, 3399; thinks the members of Congress and Senators from Nevada and the Delegate from Utah interested themselves in getting increase and expedition, 3544-3545; does not know that their names do not appear as recommending anything, his impression is there ought to be a letter from Senator Jones among the papers, 3545; does not know that it was not until a subsequent application which the witness did not grant that the Delegate from Utah intervened, believes the facts connected with order (24 K, 1643), January 22, 1880, reducing the service to one trip and restoring the original schedule, are stated on the jackets, no member or Senator interested himself in procuring that order, 3545; made the order January 28, 1880 (26 K, 1644-1645), rescinding order 24 K, and reducing the service four trips, to give the contractors an opportunity, by putting it back to three times a week, to make the route what it ought to have been, 3545-3546; understands that the mail bills show that in 19 days only 35 letters passed over the route, had no evidence between January 22 and January 28, 1880, the dates of the two orders, that the mails had, in fact, increased upon the route, 3546; but the service was put back to three times a week upon the representation that great injustice had been done to the contractors, and if they were given an opportunity, they would not permit the delay at the Colorado River of 12 hours, which made the expedition practically useless, and prevented the mails going over that line, 3546; cannot say why he did not state that reason on the jacket, 3547; the statement on the jacket was one of the true reasons, but not the chief one, the one that moved him most was to give the contractors a chance to make the service what it ought to be, 3547; the only paper referred to upon the jacket being the letter of Sidney Dillon, president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, witness had the power under the laws and regulations of the department six days after he had made an order reciting that there was little or no mail carried on the route to restore it, paying an additional sum of $20,000 and odd to prevent injustice to the contractor, 3547; does not remember what contractor or agent approached him between January 22 and January 28, 1880, to urge that original order was unjust, 3548; but remembers a discussion with Senator Plumb and numbers of others about it, 3548; what Senator Plumb, representing Kansas, had to do with a route in Arizona he could probably answer more correctly than the witness, his statement was that the contractors were friends of witness, and he believed witness was doing them an injustice, 3548; the fault had been entirely with the subcontractors in making the delay at the Colorado River, which practically did away with the good that was intended by expedition, witness made the reduction when he was angry at the manner in which the service had been performed, and thinks he recouped for a portion of what had been paid, 3547; did not allow one month's extra pay in either of the orders, it was putting it down practically for cause, does not remember that he subsequently allowed them for extra pay, 3549; does not remember that at the time he made the original order for increase that he examined petition (17 K, 1636), he was not in the habit of examining petitions with a microscope nor carefully, possibly he read them over, does not know whether he examined to see whether apparently they were all in the same handwriting, 3548; or to have seen letter of Beene (27 K, 1646) before he made the order restoring service, 3587; identifies order (8 K, 1683) giving permission to sublet, cannot say how it happened that upon a jacket which recited that J. W. Dorsey was contractor he granted a permission upon application of John M. Peck, these were mere matters pro forma, he probably did not look inside the jacket, but signed it as a matter of course 3552.

Calleghan, John T., clerk inspection division, testimony of, 1614-1619, 1655; identifies mail bills, 1614-1615, 1655; mail bills are first opened by a messenger, 1615; then distributed to the clerks, 1616; unless there was a failure the Second Assistant would not in usual course of business see the mail bills, 1617; in case of failure, clerk makes up a case and takes to chief of division, who, in turn, takes it to Second Assistant, 1617; no doubt the case containing the mail bills went to General Brady, 1619.

Dorsey, John W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, (12 K.) 1634; oath of John W. Dorsey; it is not witnesses's signature, 4106.

Krider, W. M., postmaster Mineral Park, Ariz., testimony of, 1597-1605; had charge of the office since Dec. 25, 1878, 1598; received a 4-horse load of mail on that day; no mail had been received prior to that for 2 or 3 months, 1600; identifies sketch map, 1598, and mail bills, 1599; distances and location of post-offices, 1598; there were about 500 or 600 people got their mail at Mineral Park, 1600; scarcely any mail came over the route from Pioche to Mineral Park, 1598; bulk of the mail from Mineral Park was sent by way of Prescott, 1598; identifies signatures to petition (17 K, 1636, and 18 K, 1639) as those of residents of Signal, 1599, 1602-1603; Signal is about 100 miles south of Mineral Park, 1598; no letters for Signal passed through the Mineral Park office, 1600.

Handwriting:

Miner, John R., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; denies Rerdell's testimony (2224), that witness had asked him to interline petition (17 K.), 4178.

12 K. Oath of J. W. Dorsey (1634), the body is in witness's handwriting; did not write the signature; does not know who did, 4187.

18 K. Petition (1638-1639), the word "Ehrenberg" is in witness's handwriting, 4191-4192.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 2224, 2235-2237, 2320, 2343-2344.

This is the route which bothered witness in the Congressional investigation on account of its having been jumped up and down, 2320.

17 K. Petition (1636). Some time in November, 1878, Miner showed witness a petition for increase of service on either 40104 or 40105, and asked him to write a line in it, 2224; witness wrote "three trips on a schedule sixty hours instead of eighty-four hours," and the words "Pioche, Nev.," and the last figure "4" in the number 40104, 2235-2236, 2344.

9 K. Letter of Peck, M. (1633); signature and all was written by Miner, 2343.

12 K. Oath of J. W. Dorsey (1634); the signature of J. W. Dorsey was not written by him, 2343; Dorsey was either in Dakota or Montana at that time, 2236-2237.

13 K. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1634); was all written by Miner, except the signature, which is not that of J. W. Dorsey, 2343.

18 K. Petition (1638). The word and figures "5," "Ehrenburg" and "60," were written by Miner, 2344.

Dunbar, Thomas, postmaster, Tres Alamos, to Second Assistant, March 10, 1879, as the contractor is getting $1,400 and is paying the subcontractor $2,600, public opinion is that contractor will fail April 1, asking instructions (15 O), 1800.

Eaton, Ray P., assistant superintendent railway mail service, to Brady, December 28, 1880: The route should be curtailed to embrace and begin at Wilcox, omitting Tres Alamos; there is need of a daily mail from Wilcox to Camp Thomas. Indorsed: "Turner, I think this should be done. Brady," (33 O, defense) 3293, 3294.

McKusick, H. J., superintendent railway mail service, to Brady, December 2, 1880: Route should be changed to begin at Wilcox instead of Tres Alamos (34 O, defense), 3294.

Stacey, M. H., lieutenant colonel, to D. M. Key, May 6, 1879, asking for daily, or, at least, a tri-weekly mail, over a line more expeditious than the one now used. Filed June 19, 1879 (28 O, defense), 3292.

Oath of John W. Dorsey, contractor, sworn to April 21, 1879, original schedule, 3 trips, 6 men and 6 animals. Schedule, 40 hours, 3 trips, 12 men and 24 animals (overt act, averred as of June 3, 1879) (4 O), 1797.

Orders of:

Brady, June 3, 1879, from June 16, 1879, increase two trips, allow $3,136. Expedite to 40 hours, allow $9,408 (overt act, 30 P), 1796-1797; December 7, 1880, to stop all payments to subcontractor (18 O), 1801-1802.

Brady, January 4, 1881, from January 20, 1881, omit Tres Alamos and embrace and begin at Wilcox, deduct $2,149.03 (35 O, defense overt act), 3294. February 11, 1881, from February 20, 1881, increase 4 trips, allow $15,950.62 (36 O, defense overt act), 3295.

French, November 11, 1879, filing subcontract of S. W. Dorsey (16 O), 1801.

Payments, statement showing, to H. M. Vaile, S. W. Dorsey, and J. W. Bosler, assignees, and John W. Dorsey, contractor, 734.

Petitions (overt act, averred as of June 3, 1879): From military officers and citizens of Camp Grant, for daily mail with a fast schedule (9 O), 1798; of the citizens of Santa Fé and vicinity, for daily mail or tri-weekly service, with fast time (10 O), 1799; for increase to 3 trips and faster time, indorsed by John G. Campbell, delegate (11 O), 1799; from Clifton, Arizona, for increase to 3 trips, with faster time, indorsed by John G. Campbell, delegate (12 O), 1799.

19 O. Letter of J. W. and S. W. Dorsey, (1802); body and signature of J. W. Dorsey written by Rerdell; signature of S. W. Dorsey genuine, 2699.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route: Does not remember, independently of the papers, upon whose application he made the order for increase and expedition, the reason he expedited it from 84 to 40 hours and added 2 trips instead of making it a 6-trip route, original schedule, and saving $4,704, was the same as in the case of the other routes, 3420, the Tre Alamos and Clifton route was rather a small affair, 3422; productiveness was not an element to consider in the increase of routes in that country, 3420; presumes that some representations as to the amount of mail matter were made in the letters or petitions or by parties that may have called upon him, 3420; it was almost solely his practice to derive his information upon those subjects from the parties who were interested in procuring the increase, 3420; they were representatives in Congress, 3421; referring to the curtailment of service to Wilcox, the railroad company upon its first construction claimed they were only running construction trains, and did not want to put on the mail until they put on the passenger trains, witness finally made a peremptory order, and by that means forced them to carrying it, 3398; the terminus was changed to Wilcox, under the law enabling them to change the terminus from one point to another upon a railroad in order to better the service, 3398.

Dorsey, Stephen W., one of the defendants; testimony of, relating to this route. Fort Thomas and Fort Grant, San Carlos Indian Agency, and Clifton were supplied by this route; Clifton was a very important mining town, 3808; in relation to order of June 3, 1879, increasing the pay from $1,568 to $12,544, recollects an increase was made, but was not here at the time, 3940.

Eaton, Ray P., testimony of, for defense: Identifies his report (33 O. defense, 3293-3294); report is true, 3334; the mail from Wilcox to Camp Grant at the time this report was written, 3337; when witness was at Camp Grant thinks he counted nine bags of mail there one day, 3334; Wilcox is a station on the Southern Pacific Railroad; Globe was sixty odd miles west of Camp Thomas; the San Carlos Indian Agency was between Globe and Camp Thomas; witness wanted to extend the route to Globe, 3335; witness did not go to either Camp Thomas, San Carlos, Globe, or Clifton, 3337; there were six companies of soldiers at Camp Grant, 3337; the railroad carried the mail to Wilcox and the stage took them to Camp Grant and Clifton; the department had not ordered the mails on the railroad, 3338-3339.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants; testimony of, relating to this route.

2 O. Proposal (554, 1796) written by John R. Miner; the amount "1568" filled in by Rerdell; genuine signature of John W. Dorsey, 2346.

4 O. Oath of J. W. Dorsey (1797), body written by witness, and amount filled in after the oath was sworn to; signature of J. W. Dorsey genuine, 2345, 2559.

5 O. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1797); signature and all by witness, 2345.

6 O. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1797); signature and all by witness, 2345.

7 O. Letter of J. W. Dorsey (1798); signature and all by witness, 2345.

9 O. Petition (1798), in handwriting of S. W. Dorsey; witness saw him write it in April, 1879, 2345, 2346.

11 O. Petition (1799), was written by John A. Sibbald, 2346.

12 O. Petition (1799), was written by James W. Donnelly, a clerk in the Land Office, 2346, 2560.

17 O. Subcontract of S. W. Dorsey (1801), was written by Miner; signatures of J. W. and S. W. Dorsey are genuine, 2346.

19 O. Letter of J. W. and S. W. Dorsey (1802); the letter and signature of J. W. Dorsey written by Rerdell; signature of S. W. Dorsey genuine, 2346.

- Argument, opening of Mr. Bliss referring to this route, 250, 257, 270, 282, 313-316; of W. W. Kerr for the prosecution, relating to this route, 4607-4616; of Jeremiah M. Wilson for the defense, relating to this route, 5162-5167.
- Argument on the question of the admission of petition of postmasters for extension of schedule (15 D), filed March 13, 1880, and subsequent to the date of the order for expedition, of Mr. Davidge, 956-957; Mr. Wilson, 958-959; Mr. Merrick, 960-963; Mr. Carpenter, 963-964.
- On the motion to strike out letter of M. C. Rerdell (22 D) asking Johnson to get up petitions, and to direct all letters to him, as he has charge of Peck's business, of Mr. Ingersoll, 983-986; Mr. Bliss, 984; Mr. Merrick, 985.
- Contract of John M. Peck with the United States, dated March 15, 1878, executed by Peck May 11, 1878, $1,168 per annum, sureties S. N. Hoyt and D. W. C. Wheeler, witnessed by George P. Fall and A. E. Boone (1 D), 546, 948-949.
- Decisions of the court:
- Excluding petition (15 D, 956) of postmasters for extension of schedule, filed March 13, 1880, upon the ground that it was filed long after the contract had been entered into, and the act complained of had been done, 964-965; and letter of Nephi D. Smithson (144 D, 954) stating that expedition is unnecessary, received December 16, 1879, on account of its date, and, that if there was impropriety in the order, it will have to be made out by other and different notice to Brady before the contract was entered into, 965; overruling motion excluding letter of Rerdell, dated April 12, 1879 (22 D, 981), asking Johnson to get up petitions upon the ground, that, although the efforts of a contractor to get up petitions, if they are fair, are no evidence of fraud, yet it is competent for the prosecution to show in what manner these petitions, that seem to be spontaneous applications, were inspired, who inspired them, and who suggested them, for the purpose of showing that there was an understanding and combination, 986-987.
- Drafts drawn by John M. Peck, contractor, on the Sixth Auditor, in favor of:
- Bosler J. W., witnessed by L. R. Bacon and Harvey G. Gray, no date, second quarter, 1880 (54 D), 1016-1017; no date, third quarter, 1880 (57 D), 1017; October 1, 1880, fourth quarter, 1880 (60 D), 1017; January 4, 1881, first quarter, 1881 (63 D), 1017.
- Dorsey, S. W., witnessed by L. R. Bacon and Harvey G. Gray, April 1, 1879, second quarter, 1879 (42 D), 1015; July 17, 1879, third quarter, 1879 (45 D), 1015; October 7, 1879, fourth quarter, 1879 (48 D), 1016; no date, first quarter, 1880 (51 D), 1016.
- Vaile, H. M., witnessed by M. C. Rerdell and Harvey G. Gray, November 1, 1878, fourth quarter, 1878 (34 D), 1014, November 1, 1878, first quarter, 1879 (38 D), 1015.
- Exceptions to rulings, admitting:
- Files, that they are not shown to be complete, 947; subcontract of Vaile (8 D), 953; petition of postmasters for extension of schedule (15 D), 956, afterwards excluded, 965; subcontract of Nephi Johnson (17 D), without proof of signature; subcontract of Nephi Johnson (18 D), that it was not filed until 1882, 972; letter of J. Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, referring to order (2 D, 949) to decrease the running time from 60 to 33 hours and allow the contractor $12,718.22 based upon the affidavit (6 D, 951) which recites that the necessary men and animals to carry the mail 7 times a week on the then present schedule was 3 men and 6 animals, and the number necessary on a 33-hour schedule was 5 men and 18 animals; witness did not figure to ascertain if the affidavit was true, or that on the existing schedule each animal must have traveled 20 hours in each day, and each man must have traveled 40 hours in every 24, and before expedition each animal would have to travel 44 miles a day, and after expedition only 14 miles; about the only figuring he did was to ascertain that after increase and expedition the service would cost about $22.61 a mile, which was considerably less than his general rule, and comparatively cheap, 3555; thinks he made the order for expedition (2 D, 949) on this route upon application of Delegate Cannon, 3434; presumes he arrived at the 33-hour schedule called for in the order by ascertaining that would make the running time about 4 miles an hour night and day; the reduction of time from 60 to 48 hours asked for in petitions would not have been much of an expedition, 3435; the order having been made July 8, upon petitions filed June 25, witness cannot tell how it happened that John M. Peck, the contractor in New Mexico, in January, 1879, happened to make an affidavit which called for precisely the schedule of 33 hours; the affidavit was filed June 25, the same time the petitions were, 3435; and witness made the order upon that affidavit, 3436.

Dorsey, Stephen W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, in relation to order July 8, increasing pay from $1,168 to $17,390, remembers there was an increase, but not as to time, 3940; referring to affidavit of Peck (6 D, 951), does not think he directed Rerdell to fill up the blank affidavit and preserve the proportion of 150 to 200 per cent., but it is possible he may have done so, 3773, 3945; questions of that sort were determined by the officials of the Post-Office Department, 3773; cannot tell when it was filled up; the indorsement that it was filed in the department June 25, 1879, is probably correct; witness was here at that time, 3946; is quite sure he did not tell Rerdell to take one of the blank affidavits and fill it up, for the reason that Rerdell had entire charge and attended to that business, 3946; has not seen the benefit of the increase to $17,390 from $1,168; he drew the draft for the September quarter 1879, 3946; Rerdell had no interest in the route, but believes he claimed one; he paid Rerdell $3,000 a year for his services; whatever work Rerdell did ought to have been done for his benefit, 3946; Rerdell stole $4,900 on that route from Bosler and himself in February, 1882; in the division there was a subcontract for the entire pay, and Bosler had the draft for the entire pay and Bosler sent out the checks to pay the carrier, and the money paid to Bosler was charged up to witness's account; that is his part of it, 3947; Mr. Merrick will have a chance to ask Bosler about it, 3947.

Johnson, Nephi, subcontractor, testimony of, 966, 1009; as to sketch map, 967; distances, 968, 979, 989; identifies subcontracts (17 D), 969 (18 D), 971; letter of John W. Dorsey (19 D), 973; of Stephen W. Dorsey (20 D), 974; of Peck (21 D), 980, (26 D), 988; of Rerdell (22 D, 23 D, 24 D, and 25 D), 980, 981; letters written by himself (27 D, 28 D, 29 D, and 30 D, defense), 991; had a conversation with John W. Dorsey in July, 1879; Dorsey admitted that his brother, Stephen W., was interested in the mail contracts, 975; and wanted witness to send in petitions that they had influence to get them granted, 975, 978; Dorsey offered him a thousand dollars to sign the clause for reduced speed and witness signed it, 975; was notified to put on expedited service July 15, 1879, 976; circulated petition (4 D), 976; signed it, 993; mailed it to box 706, 977; understood the petition asked for 6 trips, 977; did not know of or circulate any petition for 33 hours' schedule, 978, 1006; recognizes signatures to petition (5 D), 978; population, 978-799; returned subcontract received from S. W. Dorsey unexecuted, 980; pay after expedition, $8,444; after January 1, 1880, they increased it $1,556, 982; was fined $600 for not putting service on route 41120, 983; used 2 men and 6 horses for 1 trip, 60-hour schedule, 988; used 4 men and 10 horses for 3 trips, 60-hour schedule, 989; used 7 men and 15 horses, 7 trips, 33-hour schedule, 989; mines, 994; stockraising 995, railroad connections, 995, 996; men and animals, 997-1002, 1002, 1006; carried passengers, 997; claim for extra distance rejected, 1009.

Johnson, Wm. D., merchant, Kanab, Utah, testimony of, 1009-1014; wrote the body of petition (4 D), 1010; the word and figure "seven" not in petition when he wrote it, 1011; wrote the petition for six trips (6); called 6 times a week a daily route, 1011; recognizes certain signatures to petitions (5 D), 1011 (4 D), 1012; cross-examined as to petitions (4 D and 5 D), 1012, 1013.

Laird, Chas. H., clerk Finance Office, testimony of, 1018; produces receipts for warrants from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's office, 1018.

Miner, John R., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route:

6 D. Oath of Peck (951); body is in witness' handwriting, except the words "seven times a week," "three," "six," "thirty-three," "seventy-five," and "eighteen;" thinks Rerdell filled it in, 4244; does not know that it was in blank when he sent it to Peck, 4245; thinks it is Peck's signature, 4246.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 2241-2242, 2278, 2334-2335, 2342, 2361, 2568.

Handwriting:

3 D. Letter of J. M. Peck (950), signature and all written by witness, 2334.

5 D. Petition (950); body was written by witness in Washington by direction of S. W. Dorsey, and sent to Nephi Johnson, 2334.

Rerdell, M. C.—Continued.

- 6 D. Oath of Peck (951); body was written by Miner, except the number "41119" and the words "seven times a week," "three," "six," "thirty-three," "seven," "five," and "eighteen," which was written by witness, about June 25, 2241, 2557. Genuine signature of Peck, 2558. The oath is one of the blanks turned over at the time of the separation of the interests, and when a petition for increase arrived S. W. Dorsey instructed witness to fill up one of Peck's affidavits for daily service, and to preserve the proportion of 150 to 250 per cent. increase, 2241-2242, 2278, 2334-2335, 2361. Witness had no information as to the number of men and animals used on the existing schedule, 2342.
- 8 D. Subcontract of Vaile (952); it was all written by Miner except signatures of Vaile and Rerdell, which are genuine, 2335.

24 I. Letter of Peck (1338), part of the letter and signature of Peck written by Rerdell, 2696.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route.

Order (5 I, 1332) to reduce running time from 121 to 50 hours; allow the contractor $14,486.10 and subcontractor $6,971.02: the length of the route was 195 miles, and 50 hours would make it about 4 miles an hour, 3584; petition (19 I, 1336) asks for much faster speed, and letter of Maxwell (16 I, 1335) asks for fast time; petitions (13 and 14 I, 1335) for greatly increased speed; none of them name any time, except letter of Senator Mitchell (17 I, 1336), which asks for 100 hours; cannot explain how it was that on January, 1879, J. M. Peck, in New Mexico, knew he wanted an affidavit showing the number of men and horses that would be required on a schedule of 50 hours, 3584; having made that order in June, witness made the order (23 I, 1338) upon the request of the contractor to change the schedule to 60 hours from November 1 to March 31; to 40 hours from April 1 to October 31, 3584; only explanation he knows of is the affidavit (26 I, 1338, 1339) stating the snow attains the depth of 50 feet, 3584, 3585; witness considers that that schedule answers the public convenience just as well, 3585; the reason he increased and expedited this route and allowed $6,652.89 more than it would have cost for six trips, original schedule, was the same as on the other routes, 3422; the reason witness made the order (5 I, 1332) and allowed the contractor $14,486.10, and subcontractor, who was to perform the service, $6,971.02, was, it was provided for in the subcontract; he was not dealing with the subcontractor; the contractor is held for the service winter and summer, and the subcontractor is not, 3459, 3460; this service cost only $28.66 per mile, and it was an exceedingly difficult service to perform, 3460; upon this route he paid $21,603, and of that amount subcontractor got $6,976; that was a proper contract for him to make, and the service was cheap then, 3460.

Calleghan, John T., inspection clerk, testimony of, 2094-2102, 2133-2135; identifies mail bills, 2100, 2102, 2133-2135; in making up cases for deductions and remissions, they do not take the amount of mail into consideration, nor do they call the attention of the Second Assistant to the amount of mail, 2134; there are from 600 to 1,000 cases of deductions and remissions in a quarter, 2134; everything material is indorsed upon the jacket, 2135.

Dorsey, Stephen W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, referring to order of June 26, 1879, increasing the pay from $2,468 to $19,133, witness was here June 26; the route ought to have been made daily, in his judgment, at any reasonable cost, 3940; does not think that he wrote to Frank Wilcox, saying, "It is now once a week" (the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek); "have the time faster than it now is; I inclose you about the form of petition," 3997; or that he told him to send witness ten or a dozen petitions; Wilcox was employed on this route, the Looking-Glass route, and another one that is discontinued, 3997; does not believe he told him that the petitions should be written by different persons, 3997; does not remember saying to him that he specially wanted prominent Democrats to write to the governor and to Slater; if he did not say it to him then he would now, 3997; does not remember telling him to get up ten or a dozen petitions on each route with what names he could, and to multiply papers, 3997; has no recollection of telling him to be sure that all petitions should ask for daily service and fast time, 3997; wrote him a general letter about subletting the contracts, and probably asked him to send in petitions for increase, 3997; does not remember that he asked him "to send on the papers, and send them immediately; that time was very important," 3997; does not think he wrote to him, May 5, 1879, that "the time on this route will be reduced to 40 hours, and perhaps to 38," unless the order had been made covering that time, 3997; does not recollect writing to him, April 16, that witness did not want any subcontracts on file here, 3997; or that "If the present subcontractors do not want the routes and you can get some one else to take them, give them notice, and their present contract ceases when the increased service begins," 3998.

Hall, Edwin, postmaster, Canyon City, Oreg., testimony of, 1733.

Miner, John R., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 82; oath of Peck (1333); body is in witness' handwriting, except the words "three times a week," "four," "nine," "fifty," "three," "ten," "thirty," which appear to have been filled in by Rerdell; has no recollection of the paper, 4248.

Moore, A. W., agent, testimony of, 1367, 1392, 1395, 1422; sublet this route to Wykoff, 1367; witness was to have a one-fourth interest in this route, 1392, 1395, 1422.

Powers, A. S., subcontractor, testimony of, 1342-1353, 1451-1473; distances, character of the country and settlements, 1343; from Eugene City to Mackenzie Bridge, carried the mail in a spring wagon, remainder of the distance on horseback, in winter a portion of the way on snow-shoes, 1343; mail from Eugene would weigh 100 pounds, of which hardly 10 pounds were letters; carried about one-third of it as far as Mackenzie Bridge, 1343; from Mackenzie Bridge it would average from one to a dozen letters, 1344; the other way, from Mackenzie Bridge to Eugene City, from ten to twelve letters, 1344; commenced to carry the mail February 23, 1880, on a schedule of 100 hours, 1344, 1353; April 13, 1880. Rerdell telegraphed that the schedule was 50 hours, 1344, 1469; three trips, schedule 120 hours, used 5 men and 9 horses to carry the mail; three trips, schedule of 84 hours, used 7 men and 12 horses; three trips, 50 hours, used 7 men and 13 horses, of which two were extras, 1345. This number would require a horse to travel 13 or 14 miles a day. Made his subcontract with Rerdell as agent for Peck, 1345; at first he received \$9,500, the first of June it was increased to \$10,500, and afterwards to \$12,000, 1346; identifies letter of Rerdell (29 I), 1346, and telegram (53 I), 1451; reduced the service to 1 trip, a few days afterwards received notice of restoration to 3 trips, 1346; identifies map submitted by the defense, 1346; connecting mail routes, 1347-1348; identifies papers filed relative to remissions, 1348; cause of failures, 1349; recognizes most of the names to petitions filed, with two or three exceptions no signers reside further east than Springfield, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Eugene, 1351; there was a petition circulated for one additional trip, without expedition, which he does not find on file, 1351; on March 8, 1882, Rerdell wanted to charge witness fifty per cent. of the remissions, that it cost that to obtain them, 1352; explained it afterwards by saying it was paid to lawyers, 1352; recognizes the signatures to letters and petitions as the names of reputable citizens, 1452-1454; contractors owe witness \$1,000 for service dispensed with, 1455; understood that deductions were to be made upon the basis of his pay, and not on that of contractor, 1455; did not file his subcontract until March, 1882, 1455; witness wrote letters, 50 I, 51 I, and 52 I, 1457-1458; it was impracticable to perform service in fifty hours in winter, 1458; it could be done by running a railroad across the mountain and snow-shedding the road, 1458; explains his testimony in connection with his letters, 1470-1473.

Powers, Mrs. Rachel H., assistant postmaster Mackenzie Bridge, testimony of, 2085-2093; was assistant postmaster from 1876 until the fall of 1881, 2085; there was one pouch for the whole route which was opened there, and the mail taken out, 2085; in 1878 the mail consisted of from ten to a dozen letters and a dozen papers, 2086; there was about the same amount of mail after the increase to 3 trips, 2086; from Mackenzie Bridge east over the mountains there was from one-half a dozen letters to none at all, 2086; the mail was wrapped in a gum boot-leg and put in the carrier's pocket, one trip a week from Eugene City to Mackenzie Bridge there was 1 carrier and 3 horses; mail matter did not increase any while she was on the route, 2086; is the wife of Mr. Powers, the subcontractor, 2087; made the affidavit (55 I) at the instance of her husband, 2087.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route 2340-2341.

Handwriting:

Argument, &c.—Continued.

On the right of the defense, at the time, to show papers to the jury, which have been submitted to the witness by the defense and the signatures identified as genuine, in order that the jury may compare them with signatures already in evidence the genuineness of which is disputed, of Mr. Wilson, 1738; Mr. Bliss, 1738; Mr. Davidge, 1738-1740, 1742-1744; Mr. Ingersoll, 1740, 1741; Mr. Merrick, 1741, 1742.

On admission of copy of muster-roll to show that signers of petition were not stationed in the vicinity of this route, of Mr. Bliss, 2351, 2352, 2355-2359; Mr. Merrick, 2353; Mr. Ingersoll, 2354; Mr. Henkle, 2355, 2356; Mr. Davidge, 2359, 2360.

Of W. W. Ker, for the prosecution, relating to this route, 4621-4626.

Of Jeremiah M. Wilson, for the defense, relating to this route, 5167-5172.

Certificates of E. M. Wilson, postmaster at The Dalles, that John Hailey has performed temporary service from July 1 to July 24, 1878, at $15,500 per annum (6 L), 1667; and from July 25 to August 17, 1878, at $14,000 per annum (7 L), 1667.

Contract of John M. Peck with the United States, dated March 15, 1878, $8,288 per annum; sureties, S. N. Hoyt and D. W. C. Wheeler; executed by Peck, May 11, 1878; witnessed by George P. Fall and A. E. Boone (1 L), 546, 1664.

Contract of John Haley with E. M. Wilson, postmaster at The Dalles, dated July 1, 1878, for temporary service, at $15,500 per annum (4 L), 1665, 1666.

Decisions of the court:

That as the indictment charges that the conspiracy was to be carried out, first, by means of forged petitions; second, by the use of fictitious names; third, by the use of the real names of persons not residing upon the route, that the prosecution may prove any one petition to be fraudulent in either one of these respects, 1731.

That the mere use by one man of the name of another in signing a petition, is not evidence against the defendants, unless it be further proved that it was fraudulently used, or that there was no authority to use it, 1732; excluding papers the signatures to which are admitted to be genuine, offered by the defense on cross-examination simply for the purpose of allowing the jury to compare the signatures with those already in evidence, the genuineness of which is disputed by the prosecution, 1744, 1745.

Excluding copy of muster-roll on the ground that it is a report made by a third party and is in regard to facts with which none of the defendants had anything to do, as the original is not competent evidence the is also excluded, 2360, 2361.

Drafts drawn by John M. Peck, contractor, on the Sixth Auditor, in favor of:

Vaile, H. M., witnessed by M. C. Rerdell and H. A. Barnaclaugh, November 1, 1878, fourth quarter 1878 (28 L), 1757; witnessed by Rerdell and Harvey G. (L.) Route 44155. The Dalles to Baker City, Oreg.—Continued.

Witnesses:

Boone, A. E., mail contractor, testimony of, relating to this route:

Witness noticed that the bid on The Dalles and Baker City route had been reduced by $3,000; Miner stated that he was not responsible for the low figures, and that he was going to keep the book to show who made part of the figures, 1522-1523, 1595; when the circulars were returned witness noted the information in the bidding-book, upon which he made his estimates, remembers his estimate on this route was reduced by $3,000, 1585-1586; handwriting in the bidding-book was part John R. Miner's and part witness's, and part Stephen W. Dorsey's, 1595; the reduced estimate on this route was in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey, 1595.

Handwriting:

14 L. Oath of Peck (1670), all except the signatures written by Miner; signature of Peck not in Miner's handwriting, 2698.

15 L. Letter of Peck, M. (1671), signature and all by Miner.

25 L. Petition (1676) is in a handwriting similar to that of S. W. Dorsey, 2698.

2 L. Proposal (552, 1664), oath was not administered by witness on the day it purports to have been, same as other proposals, 2698.

Cowne, W. B., mail-contractor, testimony of, 1754-1757; when the service was 2 trips it took 2½ days to go from The Dalles to South Fork, 1755; from The Dalles to Canyon City, 3 trips, they had 3 drivers and from 34 to 36 horses, 1755; there was no change in the speed from September, 1878, to July, 1879, 1755; he commenced with 30 horses and afterwards increased to 36 horses, 1755; and there was from 4 to 6 extras, 1756; carried passengers and packages, 1756; when the service was 2 trips, they sometimes ran extra trips to carry passengers, and used the same horses for the extra trips, 1756.

Dorsey, Stephen W., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route: Has no doubt that the reduced price on this route was in his handwriting as testified to by Boone (1585, 1586, 1595), 3877, 3875; the reason he suggested this reduction was that this route runs through one of the best counties of Eastern Oregon, and he knew it was almost certain to be settled up in the next two or three years, and the result would be a large amount of express and cheap living, 3876; he thought the mail could be carried at the figures he had named, but it turned out he was mistaken, 3877.

Fisk, John M., mail-carrier, testimony of, 1678-1699, 1759; was employed by A. W. Moore August 28, 1878, to carry the mail from Baker City to Canyon City; Moore said that he had purchased the stock from Mr. Schutz, as soon as witness could get the papers to Washington the route would be increased, 1679; witness said that had been tried before, Moore replied "You never had a Senatorial route before," struck out, 1679; there had been no service on the route up to that time, 1680; commenced service September 5, 1878, and continued until April 15, 1879, 1680; 2 trips took 2 days from Baker City to Canyon City, 1681; afterwards carried the mail to South Fork, about 35 miles west of Canyon City, until November 15, 1878, when the service was increased to 3 trips, 1681; time was not reduced then, 1682; used 10 horses to Baker City and 4 more only went to South Fork, the number was not increased when the service was made 3 trips, 1682; mail was carried in two-horse buckboards, from Baker City it averaged 80 or 90 pounds, 1682; the other way not over 20 pounds, 1683; population, 1683; does not recognize names to petition (25 L, 1676), 1683; no soldiers on the route nearer than Camp Harney, 1683; mail was carried by Granite about June 1, 1879, 1685; acquaintance with people along the route, 1686-1691; recognizes names to petitions (17 L, 1672-1673; 23 L., 1675; 24 L, 1675-1676; 26 L, 1676) as those of reputable citizens, 1691-1692; L. P. Williamson gave witness petition (17 L, 1672-1673), after he circulated it returned it to him, 1697; petitions are true,

Fisk, John M.—Continued.

1692; exaggerated a very little, 1698; connecting mail routes, 1693; Indian troubles, 1694; there were 2 carriers between Canyon City and Baker City and 5 station keepers, 1694-1695; the horses used were furnished by Moore and Williamson, 1697; carried passengers, 1695; military, 1695-1696; witness signed the names of Samuel Williams, James Small, and Henry Williams to petition (17 L, 1672-1673), 1759.

Hall, Edwin, postmaster, Canyon City, testimony of, 1723-1750; has been postmaster over five years, 1723; all the mail passing over the route was opened in his office, 1723; when the service was 2 trips there was never more than 2 canvas pouches and 2 lock pouches received from The Dalles, that received from Baker City consisted of 1 lock pouch and 2 or 3 canvas bags, 1724; the through mails from The Dalles and vice versa went over the other route via Pendleton, 1724-1725; postmasters are instructed by the superintendents of the R. M. S. over which routes to send the mail, 1750; connecting routes, 1749-1752; does not recognize any names on petition (25 L., 6176) as those persons living on or near this route, 1733; signatures to petition (25 L. (?) 24 L., 1675-1676) are genuine, 1733; his own name and that of W. C. Allred and Robinson on petition (24 L.) are genuine, 1747-1748.

Masterson, Joseph P., mail-carrier, testimony of, 1699-1702; carried the mail from The Dalles to Canyon City, about 200 miles, 3 trips, from November, 1878, to July, 1879, 1699. Between those points there were 3 drivers and 34 horses; in the spring of 1879 2 more horses were added, 1700. It took 3 days to make the trip; left The Dalles at 4 a. m., arrived at Canyon City on the evening of the third day; left Canyon City between 5 and 6 a. m. and arrived at The Dalles about 6 p. m. on the third day, 1699-1700; service increased to 7 trips in July, 1879, 1699. Witness then drove from The Dalles to Cross Hollows; left The Dalles at 4 a. m. and arrived at Cross Hollows at 6 p. m., where the mail laid over night; left Cross Hollows at 5 or 6 a. m., and arrived at The Dalles at 6 p. m., 1700; expedition was not put on until fall or winter of 1879, 1700; used 14 horses from The Dalles to Cross Hollows, and 2 drivers, 1700; circulated a petition which he got at the office of Vaile, Miner & Co., at The Dalles, 1701; carried freight and passengers, 1702; the route he came here, 1701-1702.

McBean, Frank, subcontractor on 44160, testimony of, 1702-1704; has lived at Canyon City 20 years, does not recognize any names to petition (25 L., 1676) as those of persons living in that vicinity, recognizes the signatures, including his own, to petition (24 L., 1675-1676), 1703; does not know that he read the petition, would sign one to blow a horn, 1703.

Miner, John R., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; witness and Vaile took this route in the division, 4207; Rerdell's testimony (2215), as to the reduced amounts in the bidding book is correct as to this route, 4176; witness had marked it $11,288, and it would have just taken the contract; S. W. Morsey marked it down to $8,288, and they lost $3,000 by his judgment, 4177; 14 L, oath of Peck (1670), all in witness' handwriting except the signatures and date of jurat, 4188-4189, 4252.

Moore, A. W., agent; testimony of, relating to this route; sublet this route to Hutchinson, who threw it up, 1367-1368; returned to Oregon to sublet the route, 1374. Telegraphed to Miner for funds to stock the route; received cipher telegram in reply, in consequence of which he bought stock for the route; paid part down, and if the balance was not paid the stock was to be forfeited, 1380. No funds coming, he telegraphed again and got a reply from Vaile, 1381; one R. P. or L. P. Williamson came there, representing Vaile; witness would not recognize Williamson's authority, and returned to Washington, 1382; witness was to have one-fourth interest in this route, 1422; it was a Peck route, 1428.

Pierce, Clark S., mail carrier, testimony of, 1752-1754; commenced to carry he mail July 8, 1878, for Mr. Schutz, carried it for about 2 months, 1753; then carried it for Miner, Peck & Co. about 2 months, then again from February, 1880, to March, 1881, 1753. When he drove for Miner, Peck & Co., in September, 1878, made 2 trips a week; there were 4 drivers and 14 horses from South Fork to Baker City; in October there were 6 more horses put on the route, 1753; carried the mail in 2-horse buckboards, also passengers and freight, 1754.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 2344, 2345.

15 L. Letter of Peck, M. (1671), signature and all by Miner, 2345.

25 L. Petition (1676), written by Miner, 234.

Schutz, Emil, storekeeper, testimony of, 1704-1721: ran the route prior to 1878; about August 26 or 27, 1878, sold 10 horses and harness to A. W. Moore, who appointed witness agent to stock the route between Canyon and Baker City, 1704-105. Moore stated that he represented a powerful contracting company who would hereafter control all the contracts in the far Northwest; he wanted witness to get up petitions and stated that any petitions he would get up they would get granted, 1709; because they owned the Department (stricken out), 1709; he said that if witness would get one or two original petitions they would doctor them up and get as many as they wanted, 1709; put 10 horses on between Canyon and Baker City, afterwards added 2 more, 1710; they commenced to run about 7 trips about July 4, 1879, and on faster time in November or December 1879, 1711; when they ran 7 trips, witness kept 2 drivers and 4 horses over night at Camp Watson, 1711; has lived on the route since the year 1862, but does not recognize a single name on petition (25 L., 1676), 1711; acquaintance along the route, 1711-1716; identifies signatures to petitions (16 L, 17 L, 21 L, 22 L, 23 L, 26 L, and 28 L) as reputable people, 1716-1718; Miners, 1718; stock-raising, 1718-1720; as to whom he had talked with about Moore, 1720-1721; the route he came here, 1721.

Sleman, John B., Chief Pay Division, testimony of, 1350; produces reports, drafts, and warrant, 1350.

Stone, George F., clerk Inspection Division, testimony of, for the defense, 3314-3317, 3324-3326; identifies files from the inspection division, 3314-3317, 3324-3326.

Decision of the court:

Excluding examination of Frank McBean, as to statements made to him by A. W. Moore, in regard to the means of bringing about expedition and increase of service, on the ground that they were not within the proved power of the agency, and that the authority of an agent to bind his principal under a general authority does not extend to criminal cases where the representations which were made by the agent, at the time of the making of the contract, involved a criminal charge against his principal, 1609.

Carey, John, with H. M. Vaile, dated August 2, 1880, to carry the mail from Camp McDermitt to Doc. Anderson's, 7 trips, 48 hours, $10,000, signed H. M. Vaile, by R. C. Williamson (31 H), 1311.

McBean Frank, dated September 21, 1878, to carry the mail from Canyon City to Doc. Anderson's Ranch, once a week, $1,488; signed J. M. Peck, by A. W. Moore, attorney (6 x), 1425.

Vaile, H. M., dated April 1, 1878; full pay; signed by John M. Peck, by John R. Miner, attorney; witnessed by M. C. Rerdell; filed December 28, 1878 (18 H) 1249.

Telegram from Charles Bowling, assistant postmaster, Camp McDermitt, to Brady, December 14, 1878; received December 16, 1878; contractor has not reported; no reason why service should not commence (6 H), 1243; from F. B. Brigham, postmaster, Camp McDermitt, to Brady, July 23, 1878, owing to Indian troubles no service has yet commenced (45 H, defense), 3303.

Warrants, not read, 1328–1330.

Witnesses:

Boone, A. E., mail contractor, testimony of, relating to this route, 2695–2696.

Handwriting:

8 H. Oath of Peck (1244), all except the signature was written by Miner, 2695.

14 H. Petition (1247), figure "9," and the word "six," written by Miner, 2695.

Witnesses—Continued.

Boone, A. E.—Continued.

Independently of the circumstances, witness could not say that it was written by Miner, 2710.

20 H. Petition (1250), written by Miner, 2695.

21 H. Petition (1250-1251), written by Miner, 2695.

29 H. Petition (1253, 2683-2684), written by Miner, 2695.

32 H. Letter of John R. Miner, agent (1314), written and signed by Miner, 2695.

"Proposal 5" (552-553, 1241-1242), first page except the signatures was written by Miner, except the figures "2888," which is by Rerdell; the other page was written by Miner except the signatures, the words "bidder," and "J. M. Peck," as similar to the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey, 2695-2696.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; does not remember telegram (6 H, 1243) received December 16, 1878, stating that contractor has not reported; with that dispatch in the Department, witness cannot tell without the papers how it happened that on December 22 he made an order to add 2 trips and reduce the time from 130 to 96 hours, and allow $18,612 upon a route where the original service had not then been commenced, 3464; presumes it was the practice in making such orders to consider the question as to whether the service already under contract was being performed, 3464; referring to indorsement upon jacket (19 H, 1244), inclosing petitions and stating cost of increase and expedition, that there was "no report of commencement of service from postmaster at Camp McDermitt, Nev.;" does not recollect that his attention was called to this indorsement when he made the order; service had evidently commenced on one end of the route, 3469; the Waddell-Money investigation of 1878 was the one referred to by witness as an excuse for contractors not commencing service upon this route, 3465; does not know that the investigation closed as early as May 14, and, so far as it related to the Miner, Peck, and Dorsey bids, as early as April 10, 1878, 3465-3466; witness would not know whether the service commenced until July 1, and then it would be better to give the contractor one or even two months' time rather than declare him a failing contractor and go upon the black list; to declare him a failing contractor would place him on the black list; it would cost more and would not put the service on any quicker, 3466-3467; order (7 H, 1243) does not specify what amount of the increase is applicable to trips and what to expedition, but the whole order is less than pro rata, 3471; pro rata for both trips and expedition would have been $19,711.69, while the contractor was supposed to do the whole thing for $18,600, 3471.

Brown, James F., subcontractor, testimony of, 1302-1310; carried the mail from January 16, 1879, until August, 1880, over half the route from Fort McDermitt to Doc. Anderson's ranch, 1302; Alvord, the only post-office, about 70 miles from McDermitt, 1302; made 3 trips on a schedule of 96 hours for entire route, 1302; carried the mail in 36 hours over his half; Frank McBean carried it over the other half, 1302; used 16 horses, of 2 were extras, 1303; also carried passengers and freight, 1303; to carry the mail alone 3 trips would have used 8 horses in summer and 9 in winter, and 3 men, 1309; carried it that way about 6 weeks, and used that number, 1310; mail weighed from 5 to 10 pounds; largest mail weighed 150 pounds, which was principally dry goods, shoes, &c., 1303; from 1 to 5 letters went to Alvord; James G. Abbott was postmaster there, and was succeeded by S. H. Abbott, 1308; made a subcontract with L. P. Williamson, 1304; subcontract pay was $5,500 per annum, less fines, 1307; did not file his subcontract, 1310; received his pay by check sent by John R. Miner, 1304; Indian troubles were all over in September, 1878, 1303; circulated petitions, afterwards sent them to lock-box 714, 1307; identifies letter (26 H, 1252) and petition (25 H, 1251, 1252), as written by his brother, J. S. C. Brown, 1307; circulated petition (21 H, 1250-1251, and 28 H, 1252), and thinks they were all inclosed in letter 26 H, 1308; identifies petition (24 H, 1251), 1308; does not recognize any of the names on (Utah) petition (20 H, 1250), 1310; identifies letter of Miner (30 H), 1309.

Carey, John, subcontractor, testimony of, 1310-1316. Identifies subcontract (31 H) made with R. C. Williamson, 1310; carried the mail about 2 or 3 weeks from Camp McDermitt to Doc. Anderson's, 1310; received his pay from Miner, 1310; afterwards subcontracted with a Mr. Blackwell, 1311; carried the mail 7 trips on a 48-hour schedule, 1312; used 5 men and 15 horses, 1315; 15 horses was not enough, 1316; identifies letter of Miner (32 H), 1314.

Hall, Edwin, postmaster, Canyon City, testimony of, 1726, 1733, 1748-1750. Does not recognize any names to petition (20 H, 1250), but is not acquainted on the lower end of the route, 1733; recognizes his signature and most of the others to petitions (14 H, 1247, and 23 H, 1251), 1726; the names on petition (29 H, 1253, 2683-2684), below the first three on each column are genuine, believes the signatures of Max Metschau to 14 H (1247), and 23 H (1251), are genuine, and that of James F. Clearer to 14 H (1247), and 27 H (1252) are genuine, 1748; identifies his own signature to 27 H (1252), 1749; did not sign that petition understandingly, 1750; cannot say as to the name of D. F. Clifford, 1748-1749. E. Hall—the name E. Hall, p. m., signed to petition 29 H is not his signature, nor was it authorized by him, and the signatures of James Robinson and William C. Allred are not their signatures, 1732-1733.

Witnesses—Continued.

Johnson, Nephi, subcontractor, route 41119, testimony of, 1256-1258. Recognizes quite a number of signatures to petition, 20 H (1250), on the second and third sheets as residents to Southern Utah, they live about a thousand miles from the southern line of Oregon; some of the signers are sons of witness and have never been in Oregon, 1258.

Johnson, W. D., merchant, Kanab, Utah, testimony of, 1258-1260. Recognizes twenty names on the second, third, and fourth sheets of petition (20 H, 1250) as residents of Kanab, Johnson, and Pahreah, Utah, 1258-1259.

McBean, Frank, subcontractor, testimony of, 1316-1326, 1605-1614; commenced to carry the mail November 1, 1878, one trip from Canyon City to Camp Harney, 1316; and from Canyon City to Doc. Anderson's, 3 trips from January 16, 1879, and 7 trips from August 1, 1880, 1316; distances, 1317; used 2 men and 10 horses to carry the mail one trip, 130-hour schedule, over whole route, 1317; from Canyon City to Doc. Anderson's used 4 carriers and from 8 to 12 horses to carry the mail 2 trips, 1318; 7 trips used 8 men and 26 horses, 1318; to carry the mail 3 trips, 96-hour schedule, entire route, would require 8 men and from 24 to 26 horses; 7 trips, 52 horses, 1720; carried passengers and express in summer, 1320; Indian trouble was from June to September, 1878, between Alvord and Camp Harney; there was no trouble between Canyon City and Camp Harney, 1317; carried the mail regularly 3 trips from Canyon City to Camp Harney, 1 trip for Miner, Vaile, & Co., and 2 trips for the military, 1317; when witness carried the mail from Canyon City to Camp Harney in July, 1878, it was not under any arrangement with post-office authorities, 1325; the quartermaster paid him $270 a month 3 trips, Canyon City to Camp Harney, 1325; does not recognize any names on (Utah) petition (20 H, 1250), 1321; made his first contract with A. W. Moore, 1318; identifies the subcontract (6 X, 1425), 1318, 1605; Moore claimed to have a power of attorney and produced papers that satisfied witness, 1319; received his pay from Miner, 1320; Camps Harney and Alvord were the only intermediate post-offices; Camp Harney was discontinued as a military post in the fall of 1880, 1321; Moore told witness that if he would take the contract he would make him know that it would be increased and expedited, by papers and documents he had with him, 1606; that they had influence in the Senate and in the Post-Office Department, struck out, 1606; Moore promised that the service would be increased and afterwards expedited, but they both came at once, 1611; does not think Williamson was present when he made his representations, 1613.

Miner, John R., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; witness and Vaile took this route in the division 4207.

8 H. Oath of Peck (1244), all in witness' handwriting except the signature and date of jurat; appearance of paper indicates that it was written at different times, 4188, 4252, 4272.

10 H. Letter of Peck (1244), in witness' handwriting, 4252.

14 H. Petition (1247), words "ninety-six" are not in witness' handwriting, 4189-4190, 4273.

20 H. Petition (1250), body of petition is in witness' handwriting; witness did not file it or attach the Utah names, 4192, 4273.

21 H. Petition (1250-1251), is in witness' handwriting, 4273.

29 H. "Hall" petition (1253, 2683-2684), body is in witness' handwriting; is in doubt as to the first six names, they very much resemble his handwriting; if they are the petition came to him and he copied the names, 4190-4191, 4273-4274, 4282; cannot give any reason why he feigned the hand, 4274.

32 H. Letter of Miner (1314), explains circumstances connected with writing the letter, 4205-4206, 4282-4283.

Moore, A. W., agent, testimony of, relating to this route, 1367-1368, 1374-1379, 1397-1398, 14171-418, 1422, 1428; sublet this route to Hutchinson, who threw it up, 1367–1368; afterwards returned to Oregon and sublet the route to McBean, 1367–1368, 1374; identifies subcontract (6 x 1425) as the one made with McBean, 1375, 1423; McBean refused at first to take the subcontract for once a week; witness told him that when the route was made daily he would pay him a certain amount for daily service and expedition, 1375; McBean said it was impossible to get daily service and expedition; that he could carry the mail through in his pocket; struck out, 1376; witness told McBean that J. M. Peck and John W. Dorsey were simply bidders; that the contracts belonged to Senator Dorsey; struck out, 1378; that they could get daily service and expedition which would run the service up to $50,000, 1379; told McBean what his instructions were as to getting up petitions, but he did not agree to get them up that way, 1397–1398; witness was to have a one-fourth interest in this route, 1422; made a subcontract with McBean in Canyon City, Oreg., 1417–1418; this was a Peck route, 1428.

Powers, A. S., subcontractor on 44140, testimony of; is very little acquainted with the people living at Canyon City; does not recognize any of the signatures to petition (20 H, 1250, 2683, 2684), 1345.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 2339.

Handwriting:

“Proposal 5” (552, 1241, 1242), body was written by Miner, except the words “twenty-eight hundred and eighty-eight”; the signature of J. M. Peck in three places and the word “bidder” was written by S. W. Dorsey, 2340.

8 H. Oath of Peck (1244), body was written by Miner; thinks signature of J. M. Peck is genuine, 2339, 2559.

10 H. Letter of Peck (1244) signature and all by Miner, 2339.

14 H. Petition (1247), words “ninety-six” were written by Miner, 2339.

20 H. Petition (1250), body was written by Miner, 2339.

21 H. Petition (1250–1251) was written by Miner, 2339.

29 H. Petition (1253), body and the names James F. Clearer were written by Miner, 2339.

32 H. Letter of Miner (1314) written and signed by Miner, 2339.

Sleman, John B., Chief Pay Division, testimony of, 1326–1328. Produces reports, drafts, and warrants, 1326. Explains tabulated statement of payments (725–738), 1326–1328.

Schutz, Emil, stock-keeper, testimony of, 1722–1723. Recognizes two names on the last sheet of petition (20 H, 1250) as residents of Grant County, Oregon, 1722. (Petitions 20 H and 25 L submitted to the jury, 1722.)

Sweeney, George M., Chief Inspection Division, testimony of, 1220–1221; 1223–1227. Identifies files, 1220–1221; custody of files, 1223–1227.

Vaile, Harvey M., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route. This route fell to witness and Miner in the division, 4020. Service was not put on the entire route up to January, 1879, 4052. When he signed the agreement in October, 1878, this route was an unprofitable one, but when he telegraphed Brady in August, had no idea that he would find it so, 4059. Does not know that this route was expedited before service was commenced. Service on one end, from Camp Harney to McDermitt, did not commence until about January 1, 1879, 4060. Thinks this route made a profit of about $20,000 after expedition, 4071.

Waugh, James E., Washington, D. C., testimony of, for defense, 4304. Knows John R. Miner's handwriting. Thinks the first six signatures to petition (29 H, 1253) are in the handwriting of Miner, 4304.

Woodward, P. H., P. O. inspector, testimony of, 2675–2676. Identifies petition, (29 H, 1253, 2683–2684), 2675–2676.

Argument, opening, of Mr. Bliss, referring specifically to this route, 250, 336; of W. W. Ker, for the prosecution, relating to this route, 4680–4691; of Jeremiah M. Wilson, for the defense, relating to this route, 5194–5196.

- Certificate of postmasters received September 2, 1879, that recent increase of service on route 46132 amply supplies the needed mail facilities; that any service on a parallel route is a useless and unnecessary expenditure (47 P, defense), 3299.
- Contract of John M. Peck with the United States, dated March 15, 1878, $1,188 per annum, sureties Samuel N. Hoyt and D. W. C. Wheeler, sworn to by Peck, May 11, 1878, witnessed by George P. Fall and A. E. Boone (1 P), 546-547, 1811-1812.
- Drafts drawn by John M. Peck, contractor, on the Sixth Auditor in favor of:
- Austin, S. F., witnessed by R. S. Lewis, John L. Woodward, —, 1878, third quarter 1878 (36 P), 1849.
 - Miner, John R., witnessed by M. C. Rerdell and H. A. Barnaclaugh, and indorsed by Miner and Vaile, October 1, 1878, first quarter 1878 (37 P), 1850.
 - Vaile, H. M., witnessed by M. C. Rerdell and Harvey G. Gray, November 1, 1878, first quarter 1879 (39 P), 1850; November 1, 1878, fourth quarter 1879 (42 P), 1850; witnessed by L. R. Bacon and Gray, April 15, 1879, second quarter 1879 (40 P), 1850; witnessed by Rerdell and James C. Leary, November 1, 1878, third quarter 1879 (41 P), 1850; April 1, 1879, first quarter 1880 (43 P), 1850; April 1, 1879, second quarter 1880 (44 P), 1851; April 1, 1879, third quarter 1880 (45 P), 1851.
- Exceptions to rulings admitting oath of Peck (7 P), that it is not proven that Peck is not on trial, and on account of its date, 1813; contractor's drafts and warrants, that the indorsements of Vaile are not proven, 1850, 1851; questions as to the result of the 26-hour schedule on the connections with the other mail routes, 1817; as to men and animals, 1821; as to subcontract pay, 1826.
- Expedition, calculation for (not read 12 P), 1815.
- Fines and deductions, statement of, 737.
- Indictment, setting out as overt acts the filing of the oath of John M. Peck as of June 24, 1879, and the subcontract of H. M. Vaile as of June 24, 1879, and the order of Brady June 24, 1879, for increase and expedition, 1810-1811.
- Journal of the Postmaster-General, extract from, showing entry of order of June 3, 1879 (30 P. 1796-1797), signed D. M. Key, 4326; and order of June 24, 1879 (5 P, 1812-1813), signed D. M. Key, 4325.
- Letters of:
- Booth, Newton, and J. T. Farley, U. S. S., to D. M. Key, April 10, 1877 (?), asking favorable consideration of inclosed petitions (10 P), 1814.
 - Brady, Thomas J., circular of, to J. C. Hays, October 1, 1878, notifying him that his subcontract has been filed (30 P), 1827.
 - Craig, Scipio, P. M. Colton, to Brady, April 1, 1879, recommending increase to 3 trips, and making suggestions as to other service (11 P), 1814.
 - To Brady, September 9, 1878; returns schedule and incloses petitions for increase to three trips (48 P, defense), 3300.
 - Farley, J. T., U. S. S., and Newton Booth, to D. M. Key, asking favorable consideration of inclosed petitions (10 P), 1814.
 - Hayes, J. C., and John M. Peck, to Brady, November 2, 1878, requesting withdrawal of subcontract (32 P), 1836.
 - Miner, John R., to J. C. Hayes, July 25, 1879, the telegraph got his message mixed; have tried hard to have the schedule made 36 hours, as petitioned for, instead of 26; will pay $4,000 for 3-trip service, 26-hour schedule (28 P).
 - Secretary to same, November 11, 187-; petitions not acted upon; fears that Hayes' friends' influence with Tom Brady is not strong enough; strong pressure and influence of California Congressmen and Senators necessary to get increases (25 P), 1823; December 5, 1878, inclosing forms of petitions; have all the influential people you know write to your Representatives and Senators (26 P), 1823-1824.
 - Miner, Peck & Co. to J. C. Hayes, Denver, Colo., July 9, 1878, in regard to increase; our contract specifies rate of pay; we do not care to go on making new bargains for four years (20 P), 1822; Washington, August 3, 1878, increases can only be obtained by our joint effort; they are based upon petitions, but require active work to consummate them, therefore the benefits are to be shared; you are not known to the department, and it is necessary to correspond with us (21 P), 1822; September 19, 1878, increased speed is very seldom ordered, and never without special labor here, and considerable expense; it is quite a mistake to fancy everything done on the route and nothing here (22 P), 1822-1823. October 9, 1878, increase of service increases pay pro rata; expedition is paid for in proportion to the number of men and animals employed; expedition is not ordered except on important routes (23 P), 1823.
 - Peck, John M., to Brady, December 30, 1878, proposing to carry the mail, 3 trips, 36-hour schedule, for $7,772 per annum, additional (6 P), 1813.

- Subcontract of H. M. Vaile, dated April 1, 1878, full pay, signed John M. Peck, by John R. Miner, attorney; witnessed by M. C. Rerdell (overt act, averred as of June 24, 1879, 4 P), 1812.
- Telegram of J. C. Miner to J. C. Hayes, June 23, 1879: "Start Julian Colton, 3 trips, 36 hours, July 14" (29 P), 1825.
- Warrant, dated February 6, 1879, in favor of H. M. Vaile, 1850.
- Witnesses:
- Bergman, Jacob, sub-subcontractor, testimony of, 1816-1820, 1842-1845; carried the mail from November 14, 1878, to June 30, 1882, 1816; began carrying it one trip 54 hours one way and 52 hours the other, 1817; recognizes the names of the signers to petitions (8 P, 9 P, 13 P, 14 P, 15 P, 16 P, 17 P, 18 P, and 19 P, 1814-1816), 1817; never knew of a petition asking for a 26-hour schedule; 4 petitions asked for 36 hours and 4 for 38 hours, 1817; 26-hour schedule did not make connections, 1817; for one trip, 54-hour schedule, witness used 1 man and 3 horses 3 times a week, on 26-hour schedule, 3 men, 10 horses, and 2 extra horses, 1817; for 3 trips, 26-hour schedule, 10 horses and 2 extras would be necessary, 1843; men and animals, 1843-1845; commenced on July 14, 1879, and carried the mail 3 weeks on 36 hours' time, in pursuance of an order from Miner, Peck & Co., through Hayes, 1818.
- Boone, A. E., mail contractor, testimony of, relating to this route:
- 6 P. Letter of Peck (1813), signature and all by Miner, 2699.
- 7 P. Oath of Peck (1813), all written by Miner except signature of Peck, which is not one of the New Mexico signatures, 2699.
- 20 P, 21 P, 22 P, and 23 P (1822-1823), were all written by Miner, 2700.
- 24 P. Letter of Peck (1823), signature and all written by Miner, 2700.
- 25 P and 26 P, letters of John R. Miner, secretary, (1823-1824), both written by Miner, 2700.
- 27 P. Letter of Vaile, Miner & Co. (1824), written by Miner, 2700.
- 28 P. Letter of Miner (1824), written by Miner, 2700.
- 32 P. Letter of Hayes and Peck (1836), all written by Miner, except signature of J. Chauncey Hayes, 2700.
- Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; made the order (5 P, 1812-1813) to expedite the time from 54 to 26, hours; that made it about 5 miles an hour; Mr. Wigginton, M. C., Senators Booth and Farley, and others, recommended increase and expedition; they may not have recommended 26 hours; he does not care whether it is 36 or 26; if he was going to expedite at all he would expedite properly, and that would be 26 hours, 3436; has not found any paper which asked for 26 hours, 3437; there were probably special reasons why it was necessary to have 5 miles an hour, 3437; all the papers on file specifying 36 or 38 hours, and the order having been made on June 24, 1879, for 26 hours, he cannot tell how it happened that John M. Peck in New Mexico, December 30, 1878, knew that an affidavit was wanted, 3437; witness made the order for 26 hours upon that affidavit, 3437; does not remember that his attention was directed to the changes and interlineations in the affidavit (7 P, 1813); they were very natural interlineations; "3 times a week on present schedulde" is interlined, and the alteration of from 36 to 26 hours; presumes it was a mere clerical error in writing 30 instead of 20; it would take more men and animals to carry the mail in 26 than 36 hours, 3434; witness did not examine the affidavits with any care as to their appearance; they generally came through the regular channels, and he did not assume that a man was a scoundrel simply because he was a contractor; witness accepted their statements as conclusive, with his own rule besides as a guide, 3434.

Hayes, J. C., subcontractor, testimony of, 1820-1842, 1873, 1874, 1875. Made his subcontract in May, 1878, with J. M. Peck, through correspondence with Miner, Peck & Co., to carry the mail for full contract term, also corresponded with A. E. Boone, 1820-1821; operated under that subcontract until he made another one with H. M. Vaile, through St. Clair Denver, his attorney, 1830; carried the mail until November 14, 1878, when he employed Beyman to carry it, the schedule was 52 hours one way and 54 the other, 1 trip a week, used 1 man and 3 horses and 1 extra horse in winter, 1821; 3 trips, schedule 26 hours, never used more than 4 men and 12 horses, 1821-1874; men and animals, 1837-1842; was not inquired of by defendants as to number of men and animals necessary, 1828; carried passengers and express, 1836; carried the mail a month and a half on a 56-hour schedule, 1837; there were some deductions for failures, 1837; was paid $1,069 for 1 trip; for 3 trips short schedule, $4,455, 1825-1826; 26-hour schedule did not make close connection with any route, 1826; schedule was arranged between himself and the postmaster, 1833; mail connections, 1834; going south the mail weighed from 30 to 60 pounds, mostly newspapers, 1826; the other way there was probably 30 pounds as far as Warner's ranch, 1827; identifies letters recived from Miner, Peck & Co. (20 P to 28 P), 1821; telegram of Miner (29 P, 1825), 1825, and circular of Brady (30 P), 1827, and letter of Peck and himself (32 P), 1836; wrote letters to Miner, Peck & Co. in relation to increase of service in consequence of letters received from A. E. Boone, 1831; his friend referred to in letter of Miner (25 P, 1823), as having influence with Brady was Scipio Craig, postmaster at Colton, who had been a schoolmate of Brady, 1832; letters written to Members of Congress and Senators, 1832-1833; received draft of petition inclosed in letter of Miner (26 P), 1828; population of post-offices, 1828-1829, 1837; received one quarter's pay direct from the department, 1828; stated facts in petition truthfully, 1828-1829. Corrects his testimony, 1874, 1875.

Witnesses:

Boone, Albert E., mail contractor, testimony of, relating to this route; 1523-1525. Witness prepared and had printed blank form of subcontract 1523; S. W. Dorsey told witness to change the blanks so as to provide for a special clause for expedition and for 1, 2, 3, and 7 trips a week. Witness had never seen such a clause in any subcontract, 1524; identifies subcontract (6 G) as one of the forms prepared by him, 1524; after the blanks were printed, clause for expedition written by witness was not satisfactory, 1524; S. W. Dorsey wrote a new clause, 1525; clause as prepared by witness, 1524; as prepared by Dorsey, 1525.

Handwriting:

9 G. Oath of Peck, 1232-1233; all except the signatures of Peck and the notary was written by Miner, 2695.

30 G. Subcontract of Major and Culverhouse (1239-1240); the signatures "John M. Peck, by John W. Dorsey, contractor," was written by John W. Dorsey; the words "S. W. Dorsey May 5, 1879," indorsed on the back, were written by S. W. Dorsey, 2695.

Brady, Thomas J., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route; did not know at the time that he made the order for expedition that the mail was being carried by the carrier in a shorter time than the schedule in the contract called for; had no means of knowing unless he sent a man out there to ascertain, 3398, 3423, or whether the schedule of arrivals and departures would have shown the time; they would have gone to the inspection division in the manner he has described; there was a monthly report made by terminal postmasters that would simply show that the mail departed on a certain day from one point and arrived on a certain day at another, but it would not show that the mail got through in a certain time; that was the reason for getting up the mail bills; could have ascertained the time by correspondence with postmasters, 3424-3425; if they wanted the mail to go on fast time they could not depend upon their doing it for nothing, 3425; does not remember why he paid them some $15,000 or $20,000 more for performing the service as they were then performing it, when the contractors had raised no question as to their willingness to continue to carry it in the same time, 3425; or that they had refused to carry it in the same time, 3426; or that when he got the petitions for increase he sought to obtain the time in which the mail was being carried, 3426; without any investigation as far as he recollects he made an order for $17,964 for expedition, when the order required the mail to be carried in a longer time than it was in fact actually being carried in, but he knew nothing of the evidence in this case at that time; possibly if he had he might have driven a better bargain for the government at that time, 3427-3428; does not remember why, instead of expediting the route, he did not make it 6 trips and save $17,964, 3423; referring to order (7 G, 1231-1232), the total increase for trips and expedition at pro rata would have been $29,820.24; the contractor's proposition was for $26,946, and the order does not indicate whether the saving was on the expedition or the trips, 3472.

Hooper, Chas. H., clerk, banking house Donnell, Lawson & Co., New York, 2652; warrant (55 G. 1300) was deposited by T. W. Torrey, August 19, 1880, to the credit of S. W. Dorsey's account; when deposited the warrant had the indorsement of John M. Peck, 2652; produces deposit-slip, 2652.

McCormick, James, postmaster Redding, Cal.; testimony of, 1289-1295; mail was carried July, 1878, to June 30, 1882, in from 42 to 60 hours, 1289; is enabled to tell the time from the mail bills and from the schedule of departure at the other office and arrival at Redding, 1289-1290; mail bills put on about 2 years ago; marked exact time of arrival on the mail-bill and sent it to department each day, 1292; thinks that he signed petition for increase, 1295.

Major, John N., subcontractor, testimony of, 1265-1288, 1431-1451, 1677-1678; made a subcontract (6 G., 1239-1240) with A. W. Moore as agent for Miner, Peck & Co., at Shasta, Cal., 1275; Moore proposed to sublet the route for four years; witness said he did not want it at the price paid by government; that it would not pay horse-feed, 1438; Moore assured witness that he could get the trips increased, and that he was authorized to make that statement by Miner, Peck & Co. and Senator Dorsey, 1439; Moore showed witness power of attorney signed by Miner, Peck, and Dorsey, 1438, and some passes in the name of John W. Dorsey, 1439, and said there would be an increased trip before the service commenced, 1441; and by circulating petitions they could get trips and expedition, 1442; in consequence of Moore's representations, witness made the contract, 1442; as represented by Moore, one trip was added before the service commenced, then three trips, and expedition, and then another trip was added, 1442; circulated petitions for increase and expedition, 1280; forwarded them direct to Second Assistant, 1280, 1444; did not agree to write petitions so that they could be cut off and others pasted on, 1444; nor did Moore instruct him to do so, 1445; Moore was there about the last of April or first of May, 1445; does not remember circulating any petitions before July 1, 1878, 1451; identifies subcontract (30 G, 1239-1240); carried the mail under it, 1266; identifies subcontract (27 G, 1238-1266); carried the mail in stages; also carried passengers and express, 1266; from July 1, 1878, to 1881 carried the mail in 42 hours in summer and 60 in winter; filed his subcontract, 1275; 3 trips used 31 horses, 1277; 6 trips 43 horses, and the same number for 7 trips, 1278; had 6 drivers and 9 hostlers, 1278; used this number in carrying the mail, passengers, and express, 1278; mail connections at Redding and Alturas, 1278-1279; did not report to department the time in which he carried the mail, 1279; applied to Mr. Berry, Mr. Luttrell, and Newton Booth, U. S. S., for assistance in getting expedition, 1281; Moore first requested witness to circulate petitions, 1281; identifies 25 letters submitted by defense as written by his partner, Culverhouse and himself, 1285; corrects his testimony, 1677-1678.

Miner, John R., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route.

9 G. Oath of Peck (1232-1233); body is in witness' handwriting; believes the signature of Peck is genuine; appearance indicates it was not all written at one time; witness did not fill it up after it was signed as far as he remembers; does not remember what words he erased in order to write "three" and "eight," 4188-4189, 4248, or how he came to date it at Chico Springs, on the 18th September, the date of the jurat, 4250.

Moore, A. W., agent, testimony of, relating to this route, 1367-1370, 1394, 1396-1397, 1422; witness started west about the middle of April, 1878, 1367; sublet this route to Major and Culverhouse; identifies the subcontract (6 G, 1239-1240), 1368-1370; told Major that if he would take the subcontract he would guarantee the 3 trips before July 1, and a daily mail and expedition as soon as he would send on petitions, 1368; that Senator Dorsey was the head man of the institution, 1368; struck out, 1369; witness was to have a one-fourth interest in this route, 1394, 1422; witness told Major to leave a space between the petition and the names, so that they could be cut off, but does not know that Major agreed to it, 1396-1397.

Page, Horace F., M. C., California, testimony of, for defense, 3660-3664; has represented the Second District of California for ten years, 3660; this route is not in his district, 3661; went to see Mr. Brady at the request of his colleague, Mr. Berry; urged increase of service and expedition; recognizes the signatures of the Senators and Members of Congress from California and Oregon to letter (71 G, defense, 3229-3230), 3661-3662. Cross-examined, 3662-3664.

Rerdell, M. C., one of the defendants, testimony of, relating to this route, 2338-2339, 2341-2342, 2559.

Handwriting:

8 G. Letter of Peck (1233); signature and all were written by Miner, 2338.

9 G. Oath of Peck (1332-1233); body was written by Miner; signature of Peck is genuine, 2338, 2559.

30 G. Subcontract of Major and Culverhouse (1239, 1240); the body and the signature of Peck and John W. Dorsey were written by John W. Dorsey; the signature on the back, "May 5, 1879," by S. W. Dorsey, 2339.

55 G. Warrant in favor of Peck (1300); indorsement of Peck was written by S. W. Dorsey; witness gave it to S. W. Dorsey August 16 or 17, 1880; at that time it had no indorsement on the back; S. W. Dorsey said he would send it out to the ranch for Peck's indorsement; it was stamped as passing the clearing-house August 19, 1880, and is paid by the assistant treasurer New York August 25, 1880, 2341-2342, 2559.

Sleman, John B., Chief Pay Division, testimony of, 1297; produces reports drafts, and warrants, 1297.

Sweeney, George M., Chief Inspection Division, testimony of, 1218, 1223-1127; identifies files, 1218; custody of files, 1223-1227.

Turner, Wm. H., testimony of, for defense; when the witness left the department there were petitions on file asking for a second expedition, which was refused by General Brady, 3375; identifies one of the petitions (80 G, defense, 3238), 3375; witness did not know the fact that the mail was then being carried about forty hours in summer and about sixty hours in winter, 3376; referring to jacket (83 G, defense, 3297), there must have been an affidavit among the papers, 3376, 3377.

- 83 X. Defense. Letter of S. W. Dorsey to J. H. Clendening, United States Senate Chamber, December 23, 1877; has received his of the 18th instant; asked him to make the bonds as a favor to Boone; has shown his letter to Boone, who says he need not sign the certificate, only make out the bonds and have a notary's certificate attached; if he does not wish to do it, Boone says to send them to Samuel B. Adams, at Little Rock; has shown his letter to the postmaster here, who says that he certifies these bonds by the ten thousand, without knowing a thing of either the bidder or the bondsmen; has said this to show him that men that hold as responsible places as he does do not agree with him; that in certifying to these bonds they are committing a crime, 3865, 3866.
- 84 X. Letter of S. W. Dorsey for John M. Peck and John W. Dorsey to Brady, March 4, 1879, being empowered to act for Peck and Dorsey, enters his protest against the acknowledgement of any subcontract, or power of attorney, filed in the department in the name of H. M. Vaile, as they were made and filed without the knowledge and consent of said Peck and Dorsey, and demands that they be cancelled on the first day of April, and that no other subcontracts shall be accepted upon any mail routes in the name of said Peck and Dorsey, except those in Indian Territory, 3892.
- 85 X. Defense. Copartnership agreement between Vaile, Miner, Peck, and John W. Dorsey, dated August 16, 1878: 1st. Agreement is for the purpose of managing all the routes awarded to him, Peck and Dorsey. 2d. Vaile is made treasurer, collect, pay, and after paying subcontractors and expenses, to divide profits. 3d. Miner is made secretary. 4th. Vaile to have one-third, Miner one-sixth, Peck one-sixth, and J. W. Dorsey one-third on certain routes, and Vaile one-third, Miner one-third, and Peck one-third on certain routes. 5th. Moneys theretofore advanced to be repaid. 6th. Subcontracts between Miner and Vaile, on 32020 and 32021 are bona fide, subcontract on 32018 is to stand, subcontracts on 35051, 35053, 44155, and the extra subcontract on 32018 are made to enable the company to discharge their obligations for the third-quarter, 1878, 4013, 4014.
- 86 X. Defense. Letter of John R. Miner to J. W. Dorsey, Washington, D. C., July 29, 1878. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General advises them that certain routes have failed, and unless the postmaster at the head of the route reports on August 15 that they have begun service and paid for the temporary service, they will be declared failing contractors and the routes re-let at their expense, 4087, 4088.
- 87 X. Defense. Memorandum of J. W. Dorsey, in account with S. W. Dorsey, May, June, and July, showing a debit to J. W. Dorsey for cash, in amount $1,044, and a credit by traveling expenses and salary of $904, 4098.
- 88 X. Letter of J. W. Dorsey to Rerdell, December 9, 1882. Thinks Rerdell's reasons for desiring an immediate trial are not the real ones; if he knows of his doing anything intentional to injure the defendants in the coming trial, he will prosecute him for forgery and another crime which he will not mention, 4150.
- 89 X. Envelope, post-marked "Baltimore, Md., December 9, 9 p. m.," addressed to "M. C. Rerdell, esq., box 706, Washington, D. C.," 4150.
- 90 X. Agreement between Vaile, Miner & Co., by John R. Miner and M. C. Rerdell, dated Washington, D. C., February 8, 1878, that should route 38113 be increased to three trips and expedition ordered at an increased compensation, at 150 per cent., Rerdell is to have $2,000 per year from said route; Rerdell agrees to devote his time to the interest of Vaile, Miner & Co., at a salary at $1,000, 4288.
- 91 X. Defense. Form of mail contract in use by the Post-Office Department from 1860 to 1869, inclusive, printed in full, 4335-4337.

- Decisions of the court:
- That the presence of a defendant is not necessary in a trial for misdemeanor, 6.
- Overruling motion of Brady for a severance, 18-20. Overruling motion for bill of particulars, 23. Overruling motion on behalf of S. W. and John W. Dorsey, Rerdell, Vaile, and Miner for a severance, 25.
- Overruling motion of the Government to bring S. W. Dorsey into court, 101-105.

Decisions of the court—Continued.

- As to the number of peremptory challenges to which each side are entitled, 106-112.
- As to the manner of challenging jurors, 128-130.
- Refusing to require the Government to first accept or reject a juror, 138.
- Refusing to allow a juror to be interrogated without first being challenged, 138.
- Refusing to allow more than one counsel on a side to interrogate a juror, 147.
- Refusing to allow a juror to be interrogated in order that counsel may determine whether to challenge peremptorily, 148-149.
- Requiring defendants to exhaust their right of peremptory challenge as to a particular juror before proceeding to examine the next, 151.
- Refusing peremptory challenge to one of the defendants, the others declining to join in the challenge, 167.
- Allowing the Government to use its peremptory challenges as to the whole jury, 169.
- Allowing the Government to challenge the jurors for cause, they having failed to ask him any questions at the time he was accepted by the defense, 170.
- Refusing to excuse a juror upon his statement that he does not know the English language "good enough to detect all that is said," 178.
- Admitting the original contracts covered by indictment in evidence, 540-542.
- That any fact tending to show association among the defendants in regard to the subject-matter of the indictment is competent, whether it preceded the statute of limitations or followed it, for the reason that the illegal conspiracy may have commenced before that period and been completed afterwards, 1479.
- Admitting blank proposal and letter of Senator Dorsey to show the association of Senator Dorsey with the other defendants, 1498-1499.
- Overruling motion to strike out all evidence as to blank proposals, for the reason that none of the contracts could stand in S. W. Dorsey's name, and at the time of the bidding it was impossible to say who was to have the contracts, evidence to show that there was a general combination at the bidding is competent, 1487-1488.
- Admitting petition (2 A) to show a combination, but not as an overt act, 641-645.
- That it is competent to show a combination between living and dead parties; also to show that a combination was formed in 1878, provided that the conspiracy then formed can be shown to have continued after May 20, 1879, 599, 600.
- That there is sufficient evidence before the court to submit the question of conspiracy to the jury for them to pass upon as a fact, 2052-2053.
- That where the indictment charges the object of a conspiracy to be the commission of a crime, the crime or the means need not be specifically described, 1156-1157.
- That in an indictment to commit a fraud against the United States it is not necessary to specify the particulars, as all frauds against the United States are criminal, 777.
- That proof of overt acts will not be admitted behind the period of limitations, but acts, although in one view overt acts, may be admitted to prove a combination, 775.
- An overt act may have been committed after a paper was filed, 781.
- That it is necessary for one or more overt acts to be proved, 777.
- That as the indictment charges that the conspiracy was to be carried out, first, by means of forged petitions; second, by the use of fictitious names; third, by the use of the real names of persons not residing upon the route, that the prosecution may prove any one petition to be fraudulent in either one of these respects, 1731.
- Overruling motion to exclude letter of Rerdell, dated April 12, 1879 (22 D, 981), asking Johnson to get up petitions upon the ground that, although the efforts of a contractor to get up petitions, if they are fair, are no evidence of fraud, yet it is competent for the prosecution to show in what manner these petitions, that seem to be spontaneous applications, were inspired, who inspired them, and who suggested them, for the purpose of showing that there was an understanding and combination, 986-987.
- That the mere use by one man of the name of another in signing a petition, is not evidence against the defendants, unless it be further proved that it was fraudulently used, or that there was no authority to use it, 1732.
- Excluding papers the signatures to which are admitted to be genuine, offered by the defense on cross-examination simply for the purpose of allowing the jury to compare the signatures with those already in evidence, the genuineness of which is disputed by the prosecution, 1744, 1745.
- Excluding copy of muster-roll on the ground that it is a report made by a third party and is in regard to facts with which none of the defendants had anything to do, as the original is not competent evidence it is also excluded, 2360, 2361.

Decisions of the court—Continued.

- Excluding petition (15 D, 956) of postmasters for extension of schedule, filed March 13, 1880, upon the ground that it was filed long after the contract had been entered into, and the act complained of had been done, 964-965.
- Admitting letters and petitions, asking for increase to six trips, and upon which no order was made, which application was refused by Brady to one of the contractors who was a member of the alleged conspiracy, on the ground that it may throw some light on the motives of the Second Assistant, 3264, 3265.
- Refusing to admit petitions and papers offered by the defense, that they were filed in the Department subsequent to the date of the order as set out in the indictment, and that no action was based upon them, 3257, 3258.
- Requiring the prosecution in proving an order to put in all papers contained in the jacket upon which the order is indorsed, as also any papers shown to have passed through Brady's hands before he made the order, 571, 572, 591.
- Refusing to compel prosecution to show papers to defense before they are offered in evidence, 572, 595, 596.
- That any evidence tending to show impropriety on the part of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General would tend to maintain the issue on the part of the Government, 925.
- That the jury are to draw the line between justifiable extravagance and fraud on the part of a public officer, 925.
- Referring to a jacket in which papers referred to were not produced, states it will presume that the papers inclosed justified the order, 919.
- Excluding letter of Nephi D. Smithson (144 D, 954) stating that expedition is unnecessary, received December 16, 1879, on account of its date, and, that if there was impropriety in the order, it will have to be made out by other and different notice to Brady before the contract was entered into, 965.
- Admitting evidence to show the fraudulent character of an order not set out in the indictment as an overt act under the general charge of means to be used, 1149, 1150.
- That the propriety of an order for expedition is an important question, and that evidence is admissible to show that no public advantage was gained by it, 2065.
- Admitting retroactive order of Brady to allow pay for Pagosa Springs, 1190, 1191.
- That if Brady imposed fines and remitted them it is the same as if he had imposed no fines, 1171-1172.
- Excluding examination of Frank McBean, as to statements made to him by A. W. Moore, in regard to the means of bringing about expedition and increase of service, on the ground that they were not within the proved power of the agency, and that the authority of an agent to bind his principal under a general authority does not extend to criminal cases where the representations which were made by the agent, at the time of the making of the contract, involved a criminal charge against his principal, 1609.
- Admitting testimony of J. N. Major as to conversations with A. W. Moore, 1435, 1436.
- Refusing to admit parol evidence to prove contents of a lost letter, that proof of its loss is not sufficiently established, 821, 822.
- Admitting secondary evidence to prove contents of lost letter, signed by Brady, 1938.
- That the admissions of a defendant that a written paper has been destroyed is not evidence without previous notice to produce, 1515-1516.
- That it is competent to prove by secondary evidence the contents of papers which have been proved to be in the hands of the defense after proper notice to produce has been given, and that such notice need not be given before the commencement of the trial, 2310-2316.
- That what is paid to a sub-subcontractor is res inter alios acta, and that that kind of testimony should be stricken out of routes 38140 and 38135, 1038.
- Admitting evidence to show that the mail was carried by the subcontractor before the order for expedition in less time than it was expedited to, 1272-1274.
- Refusing the request of the foreman, that the jury be furnished with a copy of the printed record of the proceedings, 891-892.
- That the admission of one of the defendants, made after the alleged conspiracy had closed, is only admissible in evidence against the party making it, and that he can only speak of the acts of his co-defendants where his own conduct would not be intelligible without speaking of theirs, 2013.
- That the court will take judicial notice that the modern way of taking copies of letters is by letter-press copies which are bound together, and that although a notice may not specify every letter in the book, yet, when it specifies the book, the book ought to be produced in court, and that the question as to whether any particular copy of a letter which is contained in that book is admissible in evidence can then be determined 2266-2267.

Overruling motion to exclude testimony of Rerdell, 2330-2331.

That it is competent in anticipation of a cross-examination for the Government to ask their own witness about a paper which he has signed, and which is in conflict with the whole of the evidence he has given in the case, in order to get his explanation in regard to it, and that the evidence is also competent to show the part which one of the defendants is said to have taken in the preparation of that paper and his conduct in his efforts to screen himself from prosecution, 2303-2305.

That the defendants having declined to produce the stub-books upon notice, they may treat the stub-books merely as a basis of cross-examination as to the memory or capacity of the witness, but they will be bound by his answers, and cannot contradict him by producing the stub-books afterwards, because they are examining him upon collateral matter; but if they cross-examine the witness upon a written paper as a material matter in the case, they must produce the paper and let the witness see it, 2396-2399.

Excluding question asked witness (Rerdell) as to statements made to one of the counsel for the defendants, that to permit what passed between the counsel of one of the defendants and his client in confidence to be proved on the trial, because this counsel was not his particular counsel in the case, would be destroying the rule in joint cases, such as conspiracy and the like, 2453-2454.

Excluding offer of the defense to prove by witness that he never received any money or check from one of the defendants on the ground that the evidence sought to be contradicted was affirmative evidence brought out by defense on cross-examination, which, if contradicted at all, should be contradicted by the best evidence in their possession, and that notice having been given to produce the stub of the check-book, and the defense having declined to produce the book or inform the court that no such book existed, the court is bound to presume the book is in their possession, as to the offer to contradict, and as far as the offer does not relate to the stub it is an offer to contradict a mere inference of a witness, 2798-2801.

Excluding question asked witness (Turner) as to whether S. W. Dorsey or any of the defendants had ever paid Turner any money or mining stock to influence his official action as to any of the routes in the indictment, on the ground that the witness is not a party to this proceeding, and has been acquitted by the verdict of the jury, that Rerdell's confession to MacVeagh, which it is proposed to contradict, was a narrative of a past transaction, and only admitted as against himself, 3272-3273.

That strictly the law which provides that the failure of a defendant to request to become a witness on his own behalf shall not create any presumption against him, only applies to remarks made by counsel after the evidence is closed, and it appears the defendant has made no request to be heard, 3371.

Excluding question as to whether witness had any conference or arrangement with any of the defendants as to the preparation of the advertisement as there is no averment in the indictment on the subject, and no evidence given by the prosecution in regard to it, 3332.

Excluding question asked witness (Brady) on cross-examination in regard to two postal drafts given upon a route not included in the indictment, with an offer to show that the drafts, together with a certain sum of money were placed upon witness's desk for a corrupt purpose, on the ground that the evidence offered does not tend to embrace more than one defendant, and he cannot be tried for an individual crime under this indictment, 3536-3538.

Admitting question asked on cross-examination as to the delivery of certain postal drafts to the witness (Brady) for the purpose of affecting the credibility or memory of the witness, although it is not a material matter and there is a direct conflict between the two witnesses in regard to it, 3578.

Excluding evidence offered for the purpose of showing what Rerdell may have said on a certain occasion about his capacity to write, and about what he might have written on a piece of paper, which is not produced; that the evidence is not offered for the purpose of showing that Rerdell made the memorandum (31 X). but that he had the capacity and opportunity to do so, 3677.

Excluding question asked witness (S. W. Dorsey), after having been sworn on his voir dire as to whether he considers an oath binding on his conscience with a view to a state of future rewards and punishments, that under the provision of the act of Congress March 16, 1878, that if a witness is a defendant no other competency is required, 3701.

Admitting question asked defendant, S. W. Dorsey, on direct examination as to the meaning of a certain clause in his letter to Clendening that when a law allows a defendant to be a witness in his own behalf, he is a man that can completely prove his own motive, and that the deficiency of the law in the use of other witnesses is supplied in that, that the witness is not asked to interpret the language of the letter, or explain any of its terms or phrases, and if his motive in writing the letter was innocent and he is able to speak, in that respect he is competent under the law to do so, 3750.

Excluding letter purporting to be signed by John W. Dorsey that the rule of evidence has never been extended so that a paper may be produced without any evidence of its genuineness being given, and on that basis alone, the jury allowed to compare it with other papers admitted to be genuine, and so reach a conclusion as to the paper in question, 3831-3833.

That the notice to produce letter-press copy-books containing letters of a certain date but not designating any letters that seem to be relevant to this case is too vague, 3904-3905.

That section 859 R. S., providing that no testimony given by a witness before either House of Congress shall be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court, does not apply to case of a defendant who becomes a witness; that when defendant takes the stand he has none of the privileges that belong to a defendant; he stands there as a witness, and is liable to the same extent of cross-examination as any other witness, 4241.

Excluding tabular statement including the nineteen routes, the names of the contractors, the original contract price, and the amount of increase and expedition contained in report of Brady to an investigating committee of Congress that the issue in this case is whether the allowances were made from corrupt motives and in pursuance of a conspiracy, and that that table, if in evidence, would throw no light upon the subject, 4316.

That in putting in the evidence in chief if the party who calls a witness is not satisfied with the evidence he gives, he is at liberty to call some other witness to prove a different state of facts, but he cannot wait and allow the other side to disprove the case as made by that witness, and after that has been disproved call in a different witness in rebuttal, for the purpose of showing that the first witness was mistaken in material matter, 4378.

Excluding evidence offered by the Government in rebuttal, on the ground that the prosecution in a criminal suit is not at liberty to content itself with a prima facie case, and then if that case happens to be met by the defense, give other evidence of the same character, as the evidence in chief for the purpose of strengthening the prima facie case, and also on the further ground that the witness by whom the existence of the letter is sought to be proved did not know the party's handwriting or his signature, 4393-4394.

Excluding evidence offered in rebuttal to prove contents of telegrams sent by Dorsey to Rerdell, on the ground that the counsel for the Government not having laid the proper foundation, the evidence is not offered for the purpose of contradicting Dorsey, but to strengthen the case made in chief by the Government, and such evidence is not to be received; also, that the dispatches sent by Dorsey might not have been the same dispatches which Rerdell received, or which he read to James; and further, if the dispatch itself has been destroyed, and the party is not able to prove the contents, that is a misfortune, and they cannot manufacture in courts rules of evidence to supply such defects, 4410-4413.

That the mere fact that there is a contradiction of testimony between two witnesses, one on one side and the other on the other, is not sufficient reason for corroborating evidence in rebuttal, in favor of the witness for the prosecution, and also that the evidence now offered is evidence that ought to have been given in chief and the offer is therefore overruled, 4417.

Striking out evidence of Boone commencing on page 1591 as to S. W. Dorsey's having signed Peck's name to temporary contracts, 4427; overruling offer of evidence in rebuttal as to money transactions between Walsh and Brady that it is offered to meet the denial of Brady under oath relating to a matter collateral to the case and that even if Brady had testified untruly he cannot be contradicted because of its collateral character, 4445-4446.

Letters of:

And Miner to Brady, January 29, 1879, requesting withdrawal of subcontract (41 T), 2152.

February 3, 1879, refiling subcontract (47 T), 2153, and John W. Dorsey, May 5, 1879, requesting withdrawal of subcontract (31 K), 1648; (Rerdell), 2344.

To S. W. Dorsey, Washington, May 29, 1879, complaining that Rerdell has sued Vaile, Miner & Co., alleging the firm to be only Vaile and Miner; if it goes on it will expose their private affairs in which S. W. D. is interested, and will draw forth who are the real parties of Vaile, Miner & Co., asking Dorsey to advise him to dismiss his action at once, stating that Dorsey's judgment will suggest many embarrassments not occurring to Rerdell (30 X), 2246-2247; (Miner) 4183-4184; (Rerdell) 2246; (Vaile) 4028-4029, 3798, 4042-4044.

To R. A. Elmer, February 7, 1882, in relation to subcontract of C. H. French (98 A), 751; (Boone) 2686; (Rerdell) 2332.

To J. C. Hayes, January 27, 1879, inclosing draft (27 P), 1824; (Hayes) 1821.

To J. M. McGrew, July 9, 1880 (read from the record of the last trial) relative to the Jennings's case; although he was subcontractor of record, it was as trustee for J. W. and S. W. Dorsey, Jennings, and others; all the money collected not paid to Jennings was paid to liquidate the debts of J. W. and S. W. Dorsey and others; believes that Jennings and both J. W. and S. W. Dorsey are irresponsible, and it would be impossible for the writer to receive back the $2,800, 4065.

Motions in behalf of, to quash, renewed, 35; for a bill of particulars, renewed, 35-36.

Oath of, as to stock and carriers on the original and expedited schedule; subcontractor (8 R), 1905; (Boone) 2700; (Rerdell) 2349; (Vaile) 4030.

Vaile, Harvey M.—Continued.

Receipts for warrants, signed by (53 C), 940; (Boone) 2687; (Rerdell) 2334; (54 C and 55 C), 940; (27 M), 1809; (Boone) 2698; (Rerdell) 2345; route 40104 not lettered, 4066; (66 D), 1019.

Subcontracts of, dated April 1, 1878 (6 A), 578-580; (Rerdell) 2320, 2560; (15 R), 1906-1907; (Rerdell) 2349; (8 D), 952; (Rerdell) 2335; (18 H), 1249; dated July 1, 1878 (9 T), 2138-2139; (Rerdell) 2361; (9 L), 1668; (Rerdell) 2344; dated December 1, 1878 (29 K), 1647-1648; (Rerdell) 2344.

Warrants in favor of (46 A), 709; (71 A, 73 A, and 75 A), 714; (21 C), 936-937; (43 B), 858; (74 F, 77 F, and 79 F), 1211-1212; (9 M and 11 M), 1775; (35 D), 1014; (40 L), 1758; (30 G), 1298.

Testimony of, in his own behalf, 4000-4082; whereabouts during 1878, 1879, 1880, 4039; his connection with the mail business, 4001-4002; bids in the name of Sprague, 4002, 4049-4050; Miner, Peck, and Dorsey generally bid lower than witness, 4049; denies any agreement with or payment to Brady, 4002; acquaintance with codefendants, 4002-4003, 4020; denies conspiracy with, 4037; Miner offers witness all the contracts of Miner, Peck, and Dorsey, 4004-4005, 4053; the reason he did not accept the offer, 4053-4054; as to the extension of time to put on service, 4007, 4051-4052; the reason he went into the combination, 4006-4007, 4048, 4054; leaves offers with Miner to take the service, 4012, 4052-4053; knew that sureties were first entitled to take up contracts of failing contractors, 4053; received telegram from Brady dated August 20, 1878, 4011; witness agrees to start the service of Miner, Peck, and Dorsey, 4011, 4052; his knowledge of the condition of the service at that time, 4007, 4047-4049; believed that in the aggregate it was a losing service at that time, 4049; Boone's interest, 4012; Moore's interest, 4012-4013; copartnership agreement of August 16, 1878 (85 X, defense), 4013-4014; not executed until October, 1878, 4013-4014; Miner was here when he signed it; never saw Peck; J. W. Dorsey was not here, 4044; saw John W. Dorsey here in November, 1878, 4045; does not recall anything about the subcontract on routes 35051, 35053, and 44155, referred to as being made to protect the company, 4056; when he signed the agreement the service was a losing service, 4058; but cannot tell how he came to enter into an agreement for dividing up the profits of a losing service, 4059; knew that there were post-office drafts on file, 4057; witness furnished the money from August 16, 1878, but had no agreement as to how the profits were to be distributed; expenses were largely in excess of profits, 4045-4046; indebtedness contracted and amounts expended prior to the copartnership agreement, 4046; contractors' drafts hypothecated to the bank, 4014-4015; proposition for settlement with the German-American Bank, 4015-4016; filed subcontracts to cut out the drafts, 4017; conferences with Senator Dorsey and the receiver of the bank in December in regard to drafts, 4017; division of the routes March 5 or 6, 1879, 4018-4019, 4059-4060; witness gets 40 per cent., Miner 30 per cent., and S. W. Dorsey 30 per cent., 4018; separation made final last of April or first of May, 1879, 4019; terms of the division as to the payment of debts, 4019, 4059, 4074-4079, 4081; no written agreement when they divided the route, 4074; witness and Miner joined their interests, 4020, 4059; after the settlement they had nothing to do with the routes taken by Dorsey and he nothing to do with their routes, 4020; the routes which fell to witness and Miner were the Vermillion and Sioux Falls, Kearney and Kent, Bismarck and Tongue River, Julian and Colton, The Dalles and Baker City, and the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt routes, 4020; subcontracts were all ante-dated to take advantage of the subcontract law, avoid getting permission to sublet, and to get them in advance of any others, 4037, 4057-4058; never took any oath as subcontractor, 4058; did not keep any books, 4063; thinks there was a route book kept, 4074; does not think he had anything to do with getting up petitions, 4029; or that he ever wrote a letter, except those in evidence, 4029; witness gave general direction to their agent, furnished the means and drew all the money, except what went to the German Bank, 4032-4033; Miner was secretary, and had charge of the business, 4029, 4032-4033; had nothing to do with procuring the affidavits made by Dorsey and Peck or with those made by Miner, 4030; as to contracts made with Miner for routes 32030, Dodge City to Camp Supply, and 32031, Camp Supply to Fort Elliot, 4040-4041, 4055-4056; as to contract made with Elkins as the representative of Peck, route 32018, Caldwell to Fort Sill, 4040-4041, 4055-4056, 4073, 4082; explanation of his letter to S. W. Dorsey, May 29, 1879 (30 X, 2246-2247), relative to the suit of Rerdell v. Vaile and Miner, 4028-4029, 4042-4044; Hein was his attorney, never received any reply to the letter, 4043; as to his plea in the suit of Rerdell v. Vaile and Miner (29 X, 2245-2246), 4041, 4025-4026; does not recollect conversation with Rerdell (2275) with regard to giving him employment, 4021; or that he ever told him the mail service ought to reach between $600,000 and $700,000 per annum, 4021; makes no point of his loan to Rerdell during the trial, 4079; thinks the testimony of Rerdell (2526) that prior to the loan he had told witness he was going over to the Government is about correct, 4079-4080; does not recollect conversation with Rerdell (2587) in December or January last, in which Rerdell told him he was in communication with the Government, 4080; most emphatically he never said to Rerdell and Miner that he would have gone over to the Government himself if it was not for the fact that he had gone on the stand at the last trial, 4080-4081. For further testimony see Route index.

Van Buskirk, John M., surety on proposal of John M. Peck, route 44155, 552.

Vernon, John H., called as a juror, 164; examined, 164-167; peremptory challenge for this juror asked on behalf of Rerdell and refused, the other defendants not consenting, 167; accepted by the prosecution, 182; sworn as a juror in the case, 182.

Walker, W. R., letter of, to S. W. Dorsey, U. S. S., May 10, 1879, asks assistance in securing increase of service (10 I), 1334; to John Whiteaker, M. C., May 10, 1879, asking assistance in securing increase of service, indorsed by Whiteaker, filed May 22, 1879 (15 I), 1335.

Walsh, John A., called as a witness and does not respond, 893.

Testimony of, for the prosecution, 2203-2221; in rebuttal, 4439.

Identifies his note and Brady's reply (24 X, 2206), 2205-2206; had a conversation December 28, 1880, at General Sheridan's house, 2203; Brady's difficulty with Jerome J. Hinds referred to, 2207; witness asks payment of the notes of Brady which he held, amounting to about $25,000, Brady asks witness if he does not think that matter has been fairly liquidated, and reminds him that his contract has been expedited and increased, and, as a result, the pay had been largely increased, 2207; Brady tells witness that petitions are simply to enable him to act within the law, 2208; refers him to the Price and Peterson drafts as to his custom, 2208; that he exacted twenty per cent. of the increased pay multiplied by the term of the contract, 2208; that twenty per cent. of the increase in witness's case multiplied by three made about $36,000, 2208-2209; that witness was not indebted to him for the increase under McDonough, as witness had loaned McDonough the money to pay S. P. Brown, 2209; that witness owed him $8,000 as his pro rata contribution towards the passage of the appropriation bill, 2209; that there had been remissions of fines in his case, for which he (Brady) was accustomed to receive fifty per cent., 2209; witness doubts that contractors had agreed to pay any such money, Brady advises him to sell out, 2210; and asks him if he thinks it affords him (Brady) any amusement to make expedition, 2211; Brady took away the notes, 2211.

as to money transactions of Brady, 4439; offer of evidence overruled, 4445-4446.
